IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE
DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY

Civil Action No. 1196-52

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Plaintiff,

v.

THE PROCTER & GAMBLE COMPANY, COLGATE-PALMOLIVE-PEET COMPANY, Lever Brothers Company, and The Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc., Defendants.

COMPLAINT—Filed December 11, 1952

The United States of America, by its attorneys, acting under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, brings this action against the defendants named herein and complains and alleges as follows:

I

Jurisdiction and Venue

1. This complaint is filed under Section 4 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209, as amended, entitled "An Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies", commonly known as the Sherman Act, in order to prevent continuing violations by the defendants, as hereinafter alleged, of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. Secs. 1 and 2).

2. Defendant Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Company has its general offices and principal place of business within the District of New Jersey. Defendant Lever Brothers Company operates a manufacturing plant within said District.
Defendant The Procter & Gamble Company, through its wholly-owned subsidiary, The Procter & Gamble Distributing Company, has a sales office within said District. All three of said defendants transact business within said District.

II

The Defendants

3. The following corporations are made defendants herein:

A. The Procter & Gamble Company (sometimes hereinafter referred to as "Procter"), a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Ohio, with principal executive offices at Cincinnati, Ohio. Procter carries on its business directly and through wholly-owned subsidiaries including The Procter and Gamble Manufacturing Company, The Procter & Gamble Distributing Company, Procter & Gamble Productions, Inc., The Hewitt Soap Company, Inc., The Procter & Gamble Trading Company, The Procter & Gamble Transportation Company, and The Procter & Gamble Commercial Company, all of which are Ohio corporations.

B. Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Delaware, with principal executive offices in Jersey City, New Jersey. Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Company is a consolidation of three corporations, namely, the Palmolive Company, Peet Brothers Company, and Colgate & Company. On or about December 31, 1926, the Palmolive Company acquired in exchange for stock the business and assets of Peet Brothers Company and changed its name to Palmolive-Peet Company. On or about June 30, 1928, Palmolive-Peet Company acquired in exchange for stock the business and assets of Colgate & Company and changed its name to Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Company. Whenever in this complaint reference is made to the acts of "Colgate" prior to December 31, 1926, the reference is to the acts of Colgate & Company, the Palmolive Company and Peet Brothers Company. Whenever reference is made to the acts of "Colgate" between the period December 31, 1926 to June 30, 1928, the reference is to Colgate & Company and Palmolive-Peet Company. Whenever reference is made to "Colgate" after June 30, 1928, the reference is to Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Company.

[fol. 3] C. Lever Brothers Company (sometimes hereinafter referred to as "Lever"), a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Maine, with principal executive offices in New York, New York.

D. The Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc. (hereinafter sometimes referred to as the "Association"), a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Delaware, with principal executive offices in New York, New York. The Association is engaged in the business of collecting, circulating and assisting in the exchange of information among its members relating to the manufacture, sale, use, and promotion of soap, synthetic detergents, glycerine, materials used therein, and kindred products; coordinating the activities of those engaged in the manufacture, sale, use and promotion of such products; and representing them in their relations with others.

4. Each of the defendants Procter, Colgate, and Lever manufactures and sells soap, synthetic detergents, glycerine and other products.

III

Nature of Trade and Commerce

The Commodities

5. Soap is a substance with cleansing properties, produced by treating fats or oils, or derivatives thereof, with an alkaline agent. Most of the soap produced and sold in the United States is designed to be used with water and is water-soluble. Most of the water-soluble soap produced in the United States is designed ultimately to be sold and used as a cleansing product.

6. As used in this complaint, the word "soap" refers to water-soluble soap either in substantially pure form or in combination with builders, fillers, perfumes, or other [fol. 4] additives, and includes bar soap; soap chips and flakes; granulated, powdered and sprayed soap; washing powder; and textile soap (as those categories are used in the Census of Manufactures).

7. Of the soap produced in the United States since 1925, approximately 90% in value was household-soap. The remaining portion was manufactured and sold for industrial use and commonly known as industrial soap.

8. As used in this complaint, the term "household-soap" refers to packaged soap for use in washing laundry, dishes and like articles in the home; toilet bar soap, for use in washing face, hands or body; and laundry and general use bar soap, for use principally for the same purposes as packaged soap and sometimes for the same purposes as toilet bar soap. Household-soap is distinguished from industrial soap principally in that the latter is sold in larger containers and in a different market.

9. Until the development of the washing machine, laundry bar soap was very important among those household-soap categories. But with the increasing use of home washing machines beginning in the late 1920's, the laundry bar began to be replaced substantially by packaged soap in the form of chips, flakes, granules and beads. In the 1920's chips and flakes were the most important soap types. In the early 1930's a product in the form of puffed, hollow beads, produced by spray-dry processes, invented in the middle 1920's, became increasingly important. Since 1936 the spray-dried product has been the largest selling type of household-soap. As against granules, powders, chips and flakes, the spray-dried bead is commercially superior because it flows more freely, is relatively free of fines which cause sneezing, allows impressively larger packages for the same weight and can be produced at lower cost.

[fol. 5] 10. Inedible tallow and grease are principal raw materials used in the production of soap, and are rendered primarily from fat scrap cut from meat by butchers and meat processors. These materials are processed by approximately 700 renderers and by meat packers. Since 1926, annual imports of inedible tallow and grease have been less than 2% of domestic production in all but the years 1934 through 1936, 1942 and 1944. No substantial quantities have ever been traded on an exchange. No exchange exists today and, when inedible tallow and grease were traded on the New York Produce Exchange from 1936 to 1941, the annual tonnage traded never exceeded 3% of the national total.

11. Coconut oil is next in importance to inedible tallow and grease as a fat material for soap.

12. Since World War II inedible tallow and grease have constituted more than 60% of the total fats and oils used in soap; coconut oil, less than 25%.

13. Synthetic detergents are non-soap cleansing agents synthesized principally from petroleum derivatives, from derivatives of vegetable oils, or from derivatives of animal fats or oils.

14. As used in this complaint, the words "synthetic detergents" refer to water-soluble synthetic detergents designed for sale and use as cleansing agents performing the principal functions of soap (as defined in paragraph 6 of this complaint), either in substantially pure form or in combination with builders, fillers, perfumes or other additives.

15. Of the synthetic detergents produced in the United States since 1946, more than 90% in value were household-synthetic-detergents. The remaining portion was manufactured and sold for industrial use and commonly known as industrial synthetic detergents.

[fol. 6] 16. As used in this complaint, the term "household-synthetic-detergents" refers to packaged synthetic detergents in bead, granule, flake, liquid or bar form, used for the same purposes as household-soap. Relatively small amounts are produced in bar form. As in the case of household-soap, household-synthetic-detergents are distinguished from industrial-synthetic-detergents principally in that the latter are sold in larger containers and in a different market.

17. Synthetic detergents from fatty alcohol derivatives of coconut oil were developed in Germany in the 1920's. Household-synthetic-detergents of this type first appeared on the market in the United States in the early 1930's. Household-synthetic-detergents made from other coconut oil derivatives were marketed in the United States beginning in the late 1930's, but had attained only a small volume of sales prior to World War II.

18. Synthetic detergents from petroleum base materials were perfected at the end of World War II. The petroleum base materials are derived from petroleum fractions. Their development arose largely from increased petroleum research during the war, accelerated by the shortage of natural fats during and immediately after the war. Production of petroleum base materials requires a supply of petroleum fractions and advanced know-how as well as complex production facilities. The petroleum base materials promised from the start to be and have ultimately proved to be, cheaper bases for cleansing agents than either inedible tallow and grease or coconut oil during periods of market reaction to heavy export demand for the natural fats.

19. Synthetic detergent uses are generally co-extensive with those of soap. They have certain performance advantages over soap in hard water. Household-synthetic-detergents produced in puffed and hollow beads by the spray-dry process, like the soap so produced, have commercial superiority over household-synthetic-detergents produced in flakes or ordinary granules.

20. Of combined total dollar sales of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents in 1951, soap constituted about 60% and synthetic detergents 40%.

21. Glycerine is a by-product of the manufacture of soap and most glycerine is produced as an incident of soap production. Since 1926, total annual dollar sales of glycerine have constituted about 7.5% of total soap sales in the United States.

SALE OF SOAP AND SYNTHETIC DETERGENTS

22. Household-soap has reached the consumer principally through grocery stores, at least since the 1920's. Household-synthetic-detergents have followed the same distribution channels. Today, at least two-thirds of all household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents are bought by consumers from the shelves of self-service grocery stores. Since the 1920's an increasing amount of manufacturers' sales of these products has been made direct to grocers, rather than through jobbers or wholesalers. Industrial soap and industrial synthetic detergents have been and are sold to commercial laundries, textile manufacturers, industrial plants, office buildings, and institutions, or to jobbers and wholesalers which supply them.

23. In self-service grocery stores, the consumer himself removes the particular brands of commodities desired from the shelf. Before the advent of self-service grocery stores, the clerk delivered the brands to the consumer in the store. While display on the shelves of the store, visible to the customer, was then a material factor in contributing to sales, [fol. 8] it was not essential. In self-service grocery stores, however, the shelf space available for brands of soap, as for brands of any other commodity sold therein, is limited. Unless the operators of such stores are able and willing to place a particular brand of soap on the shelf, it cannot be sold therein. The more prominently a brand is displayed on the shelves, the greater is the likelihood that it will be sold.

24. Various forms of advertising and promotional devices have been developed and used throughout the years to induce the purchase of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents. Many of these devices entitle the consumer to a credit in cash or in kind when purchasing specified items or combinations of them. They can be used to enable the producer to offer special inducements to selected customers or to customers in selected, limited market areas and need not be employed simultaneously on a nation-wide basis.

DEFENDANTS' POSITION IN THE HOUSEHOLD-SOAP AND HOUSEHOLD-SYNTHETIC-DETERGENT INDUSTRY

25. In 1951 total sales of household-soap by all producers in the United States were approximately $430,000,000. Defendants Procter, Colgate and Lever together have produced and sold at least three-fourths of the national sales of household-soap for each of the past twenty years. The following table shows for selected years the approximate percentages of dollar sales of household-soap in the United States by (1) Procter, (2) Colgate, (3) Lever and (4) Procter, Colgate and Lever combined.

| Year | (1) Procter | (2) Colgate | (3) Lever | (4) Total |
|-----------|-------------|-------------|-----------|-----------|
| 1925..... | 30% | 27%* | 9% | 66% |
| 1937..... | 40% | 18% | 22% | 80% |
| 1947..... | 37% | 19% | 19% | 75% |
| 1951..... | 40% | 14% | 21% | 75% |

* Combined total: see subparagraph 3B.

26. In 1951 total sales of household-synthetic-detergents by all producers in the United States were approximately $280,000,000. The following table shows for each of the [fol. 9] past three years the approximate percentages of dollar sales of household-synthetic-detergents in the United States by (1) Procter, (2) Colgate, (3) Lever and (4) Procter, Colgate and Lever combined.

| Year | (1) Procter | (2) Colgate | (3) Lever | (4) Total |
|-----------|-------------|-------------|-----------|-----------|
| 1949..... | 66% | 20% | 6% | 92% |
| 1950..... | 67% | 15% | 11% | 93% |
| 1951..... | 69% | 14% | 10% | 93% |

27. In 1951 there were, in addition to the defendants Procter, Colgate and Lever, not more than seven producers of household-soap which sold as much as one per cent of all household-soap sold in the United States and none of these seven sold as much as four per cent of the total. Each of these producers has been in the household-soap business since sometime prior to 1926. No producer who has entered the household-soap business since 1926 has been able to sell even one per cent of the total household-soap sold in any year. Of the producers of household-soap who were in business in 1926 who are not in business today, the soap businesses of eight were acquired by Procter, one by Colgate (in addition to the mergers referred to in paragraph 3B of this complaint), and one by Lever.

28. In 1926 there were no producers of household-synthetic-detergents. Today, in addition to Procter, Colgate and Lever, there are not more than two producers of household-synthetic-detergents who in 1951 sold as much as one per cent of the national total, and neither of these two sold as much as three per cent.

29. The following table shows for 1951 the approximate amounts expended by Procter, Colgate and Lever for advertising and promotion of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents.

|---------|--------------|
| Procter | $74,000,000 |
| Colgate | 26,000,000 |
| Lever | 27,000,000 |

[fol. 10] 30. During the period 1936 through 1951, Procter, Colgate and Lever have used in making their soap products more than three-fourths of the total inedible tallow and grease used for making soap in the United States. During the same period they have purchased about two thirds of all the inedible tallow and grease available for use in the United States.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE

31. Each of the defendants Procter, Colgate and Lever now has, and for many years has had, manufacturing plants engaged in producing, and sales offices engaged in selling, substantial quantities of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents in states other than the states in which they deliver said commodities (or cause to be delivered) to the purchasers thereof.

IV

OFFENSES CHARGED

32. Beginning in 1926 and continuing thereafter up to and including the date of the filing of this complaint, all the defendants have been engaged in a combination and conspiracy in unreasonable restraint of and to monopolize the aforesaid trade and commerce among the several states in the production and sale of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. Secs. 1 and 2). Defendants Procter, Colgate and Lever are now monopolizing and, for at least 15 years prior to the filing of this complaint, have continuously monopolized the aforesaid trade and commerce among the several states in the production and sale of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. Sec. 2). Defendants threaten to continue said offenses and will continue them unless the relief hereinafter prayed for in this complaint is granted.

[fol. 11] 33. The aforesaid combination and conspiracy has consisted of a continuing concert of action among the defendants, the principal objectives of which have been:

A. As to household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents, that defendants Procter, Lever and Colgate

- (1) Attain, maintain, augment, and exploit positions of dominance over all others engaged in producing and selling these products; and
- (2) Restrict and control competition with each other and with all others engaged in producing and selling these products.

B. As to the principal materials used in soap and synthetic detergents, that defendants Procter, Lever and Colgate

- (1) Attain, maintain, augment, and exploit positions of dominance over all others engaged in the purchase and sale of those materials; and
- (2) Restrict and control competition with each other and with all others engaged in the purchase and sale of those materials.

34. To effectuate the objectives of the aforesaid combination and conspiracy:

A. Defendants Procter, Lever and Colgate have attained, maintained, augmented, and exploited their dominance over all others and restricted and controlled competition with each other and with all others engaged in the production and sale of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents

- (1) By establishing, maintaining, and dominating the the defendant Association and causing it to assist them in the accomplishment of the objectives of the combination and conspiracy;
- [fol. 12] (2) by achieving control (through merger or acquisition by one or another of said defendants) over production, distribution and sales facilities of manufacturers of household-soap;
- (3) By exchanging information concerning prices; terms and conditions of sale; advertising and promotional methods, claims, and expenditures; packaging; production processes; sales; costs; and raw materials;
- (4) By controlling and fixing prices at which their brands are sold by themselves and by retailers;
- (5) By controlling and fixing terms and conditions of sale for their brands;
- (6) By controlling and regulating their use of advertising and promotional methods and claims;
- (7) By controlling, manipulating and fixing amounts which they expend for promotions and advertising;
- (8) By sharing, by cross licenses to the exclusion of others, patents and patent rights controlling com-mercially superior spray-dried soap products, and processes and apparatus for making such products;

- (9) By sharing market-survey facilities;
- (10) By employing in the several market areas of the United States methods of couponing, sampling, special deals and other promotional and advertising devices which are designed systematically to utilize the advantages arising from multiple established brands, shared market-survey facilities, and sales organizations operating in every market area, with [fol. 13] the purpose and effect of:

- (a) Inducing retail sellers, particularly operators of self-service stores; to give defendants' brands predominant shares of the shelf space devoted to display of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents, and
 - (b) Obstructing the promotion and sale of existing and new brands of household-soap and house-synthetic-detergents produced by other manufacturers;
- (11) By inducing principal producers of base materials for synthetic detergents to concentrate on the production of these materials for sale to Procter, Lever and Colgate, and to discontinue or curtail production of synthetic detergents;
- (12) By restricting and controlling competition among themselves and with others in the production and sale of glycerine by
 - (a) Curtailing the volume of glycerine production,
 - (b) Controlling and fixing prices at which, and the terms and conditions under which, glycerine is sold, and
 - (c) By exchanging information concerning glycerine prices, price policies, production, stocks, supplies, consumer demand, and imports from other countries into the United States; and [fol. 14]. (13) By doing each and all of the things described hereinafter in subparagraph 34-B of this complaint.

B. Defendants Procter, Lever and Colgate have attained, maintained, augmented, and exploited their dominance over all others engaged in the purchase and sale of principal materials used in the production of soap and synthetic detergents, and have restricted and controlled competition with each other and with all others engaged in the purchase and sale of said materials:

- (1) By exchanging information concerning policies, practices and market positions for purchases of raw materials, which information related to prices offered, amounts to be purchased, prices paid and to be paid, stocks, supplies, and amounts purchased;
- (2) By obtaining systematic discriminatory preferences over other purchasers of inedible tallow and grease, of other raw materials used in the production of soap;
- (3) By controlling and manipulating market-price reporting mechanisms for inedible tallow and grease;
- (4) By encouraging others to buy and sell inedible tallow and grease at prices based on the market-prices reported by the mechanisms referred to in subparagraph 34-B (3);
- (5) By making purchases, commonly termed "confidential deals" requiring that sellers (including any participating brokers) conceal such transactions in order to avoid their affecting either the market-prices reported by the mechanisms referred to in [fol. 15] subparagraph 34-B (3), or the market positions of other buyers and sellers;
- (6) By controlling, manipulating and fixing prices at which they purchase inedible tallow and grease, and other raw materials used in the production of soap;
- (7) By sometimes requiring sellers of inedible tallow and grease, and of other raw materials used in soap to sell to them direct without the intervention of brokers and at other times requiring sellers to sell to them through brokers whose commissions are paid by the sellers;
- (8) By dominating brokers whose commissions are paid by sellers of inedible tallow and grease, and of other raw materials used in the production of soap;
- (9) By acquiring from others exclusive patent rights controlling base materials and processes for the production of base materials, for synthetic detergents derived from vegetable and from animal fats and oils;

- (10) By purchasing and agreeing to purchase substantially all of the available supplies of petroleum base materials used in the production of synthetic detergents;
- (11) By inducing principal producers of base materials for synthetic detergents to concentrate on the production of base materials for sale to Procter, Lever and Colgate, and to discontinue or curtail production of synthetic detergents; and
- (12) by doing each and all of the things described in subparagraph 34-A. of this complaint.

[fol. 16] C. The defendant Association has assisted the other defendants in doing the things described in subparagraphs 34-A and 34-B of this complaint.

35. Pursuant to the aforesaid combination and conspiracy to restrain and monopolize, and to achieve and maintain the monopolization charged in paragraph 32 of this complaint, the defendants have done those things which are described in paragraph 34 of this complaint.

Effects

36. The effects of the combination and conspiracy alleged in this complaint have been, among others:

A. Housewives and other consumers of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents have been and are compelled to buy household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents at prices and under market conditions dictated by defendants Procter, Colgate and Lever;

B. Other manufacturers of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents have been excluded from the opportunity of competing freely with Procter, Colgate and Lever in the sale and distribution of said products;

C. Companies other than Procter, Colgate and Lever have been and now are being prevented from marketing new brands of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents;

D. Producers and sellers of inedible tallow and grease, and the butchers, processors and livestock producers from whom they obtain the fat and scrap from which inedible tallow and grease are made, have been and now are being deprived of the benefits of a free competitive market for the sale of inedible tallow and grease; and [fol. 17] E. Grocers have been and now are being deprived of the benefits of a free competitive market in which to purchase household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents.

PRAYER

Wherefore, plaintiff prays:

1. That the Court adjudge and decree that all the defendants have combined and conspired to restrain and monopolize interstate trade and commerce in the production and sale of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents and in the purchase and sale of the principal materials used in soap and synthetic detergents in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act.

2. That the Court adjudge and decree that the defendants Procter, Colgate and Lever have monopolized interstate trade and commerce in the production and sale of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents and in the purchase and sale of the principal materials used in soap and synthetic detergents in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act.

3. That each of the defendants and each of its officers, directors, agents, employees, successors and assigns, and all other persons acting under, through or for each defendant, be perpetually enjoined and restrained from continuing, maintaining or renewing the foregoing violations and from entering into or continuing or claiming any rights under any contract, agreement or understanding in restraint of or to monopolize interstate trade and commerce in the production and sale of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents or in the purchase and sale of the principal materials used in soap and synthetic detergents.

4. That each of the defendants Procter, Colgate and Lever be dissolved into separate and independent organizations, and that each such defendant's plants and other [fol. 18] assets for the production and sale of soap and synthetic detergents be divided among the new organizations, so as to prevent continued monopolization and to restore competitive conditions.

5. That each of the defendants Procter, Colgate and Lever be required to resign its membership in The Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc. and be enjoined from again becoming a member thereof or of any other trade association similar to the defendant Association.

6. That the defendant The Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc. be enjoined from having as members any other defendant in this action or any person firm or corporation acquiring, pursuant to any order of dissolution entered by this Court, any of the assets of any of said defendants.

7. That the Court adjudge and decree that each of the defendants Procter, Colgate and Lever has used trademarks, patents, patent rights and technical information, owned or controlled by them, unlawfully in instituting, effectuating and maintaining the aforesaid violations of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, and that the plaintiff have such relief with respect to the defendants' trademarks, patents, patent rights, and technical information as the Court may deem necessary or appropriate to dissipate the effects of the defendants' unlawful activities and to promote free and unfettered competition in the production and sale of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents.

8. That the plaintiff have such other and further general and different relief with respect to the organization, functions and operations of the defendants as the Court may deem appropriate or necessary to establish free and unfettered competition in the production and sale of household-soap and household-synthetic-detergents, as the nature [fol. 19-20] of the case may require and as the Court may deem proper in the premises.

9. That pursuant to Section 5 of the Sherman Act, an order be made and entered herein requiring such of the defendants as are not found within this District to be brought before the Court in this proceeding as parties defendant, and directing the Marshals of the District in which they severally reside or are found to serve summons upon them.

10. That the plaintiff recover the costs of this suit.

Dated: December 11, 1952.

ANSWER OF DEFENDANT COLGATE-PALMOLIVE-PEET COMPANY
—Filed March 5, 1953

Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Company (hereinafter called Colgate), answering by its attorneys the complaint herein:

1. Denies each and every averment of paragraph 1 of the complaint, except that it admits that the complaint purports to be filed under Section 4 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209, as amended, entitled "An Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," commonly known as the Sherman Act.

3. A. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 3A of the complaint, except that it admits that The Procter & Gamble Company is made a defendant herein.

[fol. 32] B. Denies each and every averment of paragraph 3B of the complaint, except that it admits that Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Company is made a defendant herein; and that it is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Delaware, with principal executive offices in Jersey City, New Jersey; and that as of December 31, 1926, The Palmolive Company acquired in exchange for stock the business and assets of Peet Brothers Company and changed its name to The Palmolive-Peet Company; and that as of June 30, 1928, The Palmolive-Peet Company acquired in exchange for stock the business and assets of Colgate & Company and changed its name to Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Company; and that the complaint defines the word "Colgate," as used in the complaint, in the manner set forth in the last three sentences of paragraph 3B of the complaint.

C. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 3C of the complaint, except that it admits that Lever Brothers Company is made a defendant herein.

D. Denies each and every averment of paragraph 3D of the complaint, except that it admits that the Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc. is made a defendant herein; and that it is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Delaware, with principal executive offices in New York, New York; and that the Association collects certain data, distributes certain information and conducts certain activities for the general benefit of those engaged in the soap, synthetic detergent, glycerine and related industries.

4. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a [fol. 33] belief as to the truth of the averments of paragraph 4 of the complaint, except that it admits so much of the averments of paragraph 4 as pertains to Colgate.

5. Admits the averments of paragraph 5 of the complaint, but it avers that the definition of soap contained in paragraph 5 is but one of a number of possible definitions.

6. Admits that the complaint defines the word "soap," as used in the complaint, in the manner set forth in paragraph 6 of the complaint.

7. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 7 of the complaint, except that it admits that soap manufactured and sold primarily for industrial use is commonly known as industrial soap.

8. Denies each and every averment of paragraph 8 of the complaint, except that it admits that the complaint defines the term "household-soap," as used in the complaint, in the manner set forth in paragraph 8 of the complaint and that as defined household-soap can be distinguished from certain industrial soap in that the latter is sold in larger containers and to a degree in a substantially different market.

9. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 9 of the complaint, except that it admits that laundry bar soap was at one time an important category of household soap; that it has become increasingly less important than packaged soap; that prior to 1930 a product in the form of puffed, hollow beads, produced by spray-dry processes, was in-[fol. 34] vented; and that since the middle 1930s the spray-dried product has become increasingly more important than granules, powders, chips and flakes.

10. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 10 of the complaint, except that it admits that inedible tallow and grease are principal raw materials used in the production of soap and are rendered primarily from fat scrap cut from meat by butchers and meat processors, and that no exchange exists today upon which tallow and grease are traded.

11. Admits the averments of paragraph 11 of the complaint.

12. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 12 of the complaint.

13. Denies each and every averment of paragraph 13 of the complaint, except that it admits that the definition of synthetic detergents contained in paragraph 13 is one of a number of possible definitions.

14. Admits that the complaint defines the words "synthetic detergents," as used in the complaint, in the manner set forth in paragraph 14 of the complaint.

15. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 15 of the complaint, except that it admits that synthetic detergents manufactured and sold primarily for industrial use are commonly known as industrial synthetic detergents.

16. Denies each and every averment of paragraph 16 of the complaint, except that it admits that the complaint defines the term "household-synthetic-detergents," as used in [fol. 35] the complaint, in the manner set forth in paragraph 16 and that as defined household-synthetic-detergents can be distinguished from certain industrial synthetic detergents in that the latter are sold in larger containers and to a degree in a substantially different market, and that relatively small amounts of synthetic detergents are produced in bar form.

17. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 17 of the complaint, except that it admits that a synthetic detergent for household use made from coconut oil derivatives was marketed in the United States by Colgate beginning in the late 1930s and had attained a relatively small volume of sales prior to World War II.

19. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 19 of the complaint, except that it admits that synthetic detergent uses are generally coextensive with those of soap; and that synthetic detergents have certain performance advantages over soap in hard water.

20. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 20 of the complaint.

[fol. 36] 21. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 21 of the complaint, except that it admits that some glycerine is a by-product of the manufacture of soap, and that a substantial amount of glycerine is produced as an incident of soap production.

22. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 22 of the complaint, except that it admits that at the present time and for a number of years past most categories of soap products for household use, and since their introduction most categories of synthetic detergent products for household use, have reached the consumer principally through grocery stores; and that a certain proportion of sales of these products are and for a number of years have been made direct to grocers; and that industrial soap and synthetic detergents have been and are sold among others to commercial laundries, textile manufacturers, industrial plants, office buildings and institutions, or to jobbers or wholesalers who supply them.

23. Denies each and every averment of paragraph 23 of the complaint, except that it admits that in some grocery stores the consumer himself usually removes the particular brands of commodities desired from the shelf, that in other grocery stores the clerk usually delivers the brands to the consumer in the store, and that in all grocery stores the shelf space available for soap and other commodities is limited, depending upon the size of the store; and it denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to [fol. 37] the effect, if any, which the relative prominence of display on store shelves has upon brand sales.

24. Denies each and every averment of paragraph 24 of the complaint, except that it admits that various methods of advertising and promotion of soap and synthetic detergents for household use have been developed and used, and that some of these methods entitle the consumer to a credit in cash or in kind when purchasing specified items or combinations of items.

25. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 25 of the complaint.

26. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 26 of the complaint.

28. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 28 of the complaint.

29. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 29 of the complaint, except that it admits that Colgate expended approximately $22,000,000 in 1951 for advertising and promotion of household soap and household synthetic detergents, as those terms are defined in the complaint.

30. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 30 of the complaint.

31. Denies knowledge or information sufficient to form a [fol. 38] belief as to the truth of any averment of paragraph 31 of the complaint, except that it admits so much of the averments of paragraph 31 as pertains to Colgate.

32. Denies each and every averment of paragraph 32 of the complaint.

33. Denies each and every averment of paragraph 33 of the complaint.

34. Denies each and every averment of paragraph 34 of the complaint.

35. Denies each and every averment of paragraph 35 of the complaint.

36. Denies each and every averment of paragraph 36 of the complaint.

First Affirmative Defense

37. Avers that as to each of the three acquisitions described in paragraphs 3B and 27 of the complaint which involved Colgate or its predecessor corporations, full disclosure was made to and clearance as to possible action under the Sherman Act was requested from the plaintiff through the Department of Justice at or about the time of such acquisition; that the plaintiff informed Colgate or its predecessor corporations at or about the time of each such acquisition that no action by the plaintiff was then contemplated; that these three acquisitions occurred in 1926, 1928, and 1930, respectively; that in reliance on these assurances and the subsequent failure of the plaintiff until the present action to raise any question as to the propriety of these acquisitions Colgate has built itself, by means of substantial investments made by both the company and the public, into a company which is able to and does sell on a national scale many competitive types of soap and synthetic [fols. 39-40] detergent products, but which, as the plaintiff has set forth in paragraphs 25 and 26 of the complaint, sells but a small fraction of the national sales of soap and synthetic detergents; and that it is inequitable for the plaintiff, in the face of the lapse of time since these acquisitions and Colgate's change of position, to rely in the present action upon these three acquisitions or any of them in an effort either to establish present violation of the Sherman Act as alleged in the complaint, or to justify a demand for dissolution of the nature of paragraph 4 of the prayer of the complaint whose effect would be to destroy an organization created with the full knowledge and acquiescence of the plaintiff and existing with that knowledge and acquiescence for more than twenty years.

Wherefore, the defendant Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Company prays that the complaint herein be dismissed.

[fol. 41] IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE
DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY

ANSWER OF THE PROCTER & GAMBLE COMPANY—Filed March
5, 1953

Gwynne Building, 6th & Main Streets, Cincinnati 1, Ohio

The Procter & Gamble Company, through its attorneys hereinafter named, answering each paragraph of the complaint filed herein, alleges:

1. This defendant has not violated and does not intend to violate the statutes referred to in paragraph 1 of the complaint and there is no necessity for any order or decree to be issued preventing any such violation or for any other relief.

2. This defendant's wholly-owned subsidiary, The Procter & Gamble Distributing Company, has a sales office within the District of New Jersey, but it is denied that this defendant has such sales office within the said District and it denies that it is an inhabitant of, is found in, has an agent in, or transacts business within such District. The other [fol. 42] averments of paragraph 2 of the complaint do not concern this defendant, and this defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth thereof.

3A. In connection with paragraph 3A of the complaint, this defendant denies that it carries on its business through wholly-owned subsidiaries. The other averments of paragraph 3A are not denied.

3B. The averments of paragraph 3B of the complaint do not concern this defendant, and this defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth thereof.

3C. The averments of paragraph 3C of the complaint do not concern this defendant, and this defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth thereof.

3D. The Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc. (hereinafter sometimes called the "Association") is a Delaware corporation with its principal offices in New York, New York. It is alleged that the authorized purposes and activities of the Association are set out in its charter, which is known to the plaintiff. The Association collects certain statistical information from its members and from other sources, including the United States Government, which is properly and legally collectible by the Association, and the Association properly and legally distributes certain summary information to its members and to the United States Government and to others. This defendant denies the other averments of paragraph 3D of the complaint and alleges that so far as the relations between the Association and this defendant are concerned, there were no activities on the part of either the Association or this defendant which were in any manner related to the charges made in the complaint against the Association and against this defendant.

4. This defendant manufactures and sells soap, synthetic detergents, glycerine, and some other products.

5. This defendant does not admit that the plaintiff's definition of soap as set forth in paragraph 5 of the complaint is a universally accepted definition. The averments in the first sentence of paragraph 5 are denied.

6. This defendant does not admit that the plaintiff's definition of soap as set forth in the complaint is a universally accepted definition.

7. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of averments of paragraph 7 of the complaint. In connection with this paragraph and with paragraphs 9, 15, 17, 18, 20, 21, 22, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29 and 30 of the complaint, in order to have sufficient knowledge or information to form a belief as to the truth of all of such averments, it would be necessary to have information beyond the scope of the defendant's own business, knowledge and information, and to have knowledge or information on an industry-wide basis or [fol. 44] concerning a different industry such as rendering or petroleum production, and in some instances, knowledge concerning the defendant's competitors, Lever and Colgate and others, none of which the defendant has or knows in sufficient detail to answer.

8. This defendant does not admit that the plaintiff's definition of household soap as set forth in the first sentence of paragraph 8 of the complaint is a universally accepted definition. The averments in the last sentence of paragraph 8 of the complaint are denied.

9. This defendant admits that in the early 1930's a product in the form of puffed, hollow beads, produced by spray-dry processes, became increasingly important. Except as herein admitted, this defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments in paragraph 9 of the complaint.

10. Inedible tallow and grease are principal raw materials used in the production of soap and are rendered primarily from fat scrap cut from meat by butchers, packers, and other meat processors. These materials are processed by approximately 700 renderers and by meat packers. No exchange exists today. Except as herein admitted, this defendant is without knowledge or information [fol. 45] sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments of paragraph 10 of the complaint.

13. This defendant does not admit that the plaintiff's definition of synthetic detergents as set forth in paragraph 13 of the complaint is a universally accepted definition. The averments of paragraph 13 are denied.

14. This defendant does not admit that the plaintiff's definition of synthetic detergents as set forth in paragraph 14 of the complaint is a universally accepted definition.

15. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments of paragraph 15 of the complaint.

16. This defendant does not admit that the plaintiff's definition of household synthetic detergents as set forth in paragraph 16 of the complaint is a universally accepted definition. The averments in the last sentence of paragraph 16 of the complaint are denied.

17. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments in the first and third sentences of paragraph 17 of the complaint.

18. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments of paragraph 18 of the complaint.

[fol. 46] 19. The averments in the first and second sentences of paragraph 19 of the complaint are not denied. The other averments of paragraph 19 are denied.

20. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments of paragraph 20 of the complaint.

21. Most glycerine is produced as an incident of soap-making, but this defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the other averments of paragraph 21 of the complaint.

23. As to the first sentence of paragraph 23 of the complaint the consumer himself usually, but not always, removes the brands from the shelf. The second and third sentences are sometimes, but not universally, true. As to the fourth sentence, in all grocery stores there is a limited amount of shelf space which can be used for all items sold therein. Except as is herein admitted, the averments of paragraph 23 are denied.

[fol. 47] 24. Various forms of advertising and promotional methods—rather than devices—have been developed and used throughout the years to induce the purchase of household soap and household synthetic detergents, as these methods have been developed and used for the sale of many other products to the public. One of these methods sometimes used offers the consumer a credit in cash or in kind when purchasing special items or combinations of items. Promotions are sometimes used in large market areas rather than on a nationwide basis, as is also frequently the case with products of other types. Except as herein admitted, the averments of paragraph 24 of the complaint are denied.

25. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments in paragraph 25 of the complaint. Further, in connection therewith, this defendant alleges that in addition to household synthetic detergents as defined in the complaint there are other articles of commerce which may be substituted for household soap as defined in the complaint, and are so substituted. All such products compete in the same markets and are sold in the same channels of distribution.

27. In connection with the last sentence of paragraph 27 of the complaint, it is alleged that this defendant acquired certain plants or other assets of other soap companies in the period from 1926 to 1937. All of said acquisitions occurred more than fifteen years prior to the institution of this action. None of such acquisitions was in any true sense a purchase of a "business". In most instances the assets other than real estate, buildings and equipment were negligible. Accordingly, the defendant denies the averments in the last sentence of paragraph 27 in so far as they apply to this defendant. As to the other averments of paragraph 27, the defendant states that it is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth thereof.

28. In 1926 there were no household synthetic detergents, as defined in the complaint. As to the other averments of paragraph 28 of the complaint, the defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth thereof.

29. The figures stated in paragraph 29 of the complaint as to this defendant are approximately correct. As to the [fol. 49] other averments of paragraph 29 this defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth thereof.

30. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments of paragraph 30 of the complaint.

31. This defendant denies the averments of paragraph 31 of the complaint in so far as they relate to this defendant. As to the other averments of paragraph 31 this defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth thereof.

32. The averments of paragraph 32 of the complaint are denied. In connection with paragraph 32, this defendant alleges that it has not engaged and is not engaged in any combination or conspiracy either in restraint of trade and commerce or to monopolize such trade and commerce in connection with household soaps or household synthetic detergents or any other products. This defendant is not monopolizing and has never monopolized such trade and commerce and has done nothing to contribute to any restraint of trade or monopoly.

33. This defendant does not, alone or in combination or conspiracy with others, have any monopoly or position of dominance in the fields of household soap, household synthetic detergents, principal materials used in soap and synthetic detergents, or in any other field, and has sought no such monopoly or position of dominance. It does not, alone or in combination or conspiracy with others, restrain, [fol. 50] restrict, or control competition with anyone in any of such fields, has not done so, has not sought to do so, and does not seek to do so. This defendant denies the averments of paragraph 33, and each subdivision thereof.

34A. This defendant denies the averments of paragraph 34A, and each subdivision thereof, of the complaint.

34B. This defendant denies the averments of paragraph 34B, and each subdivision thereof, of the complaint.

34C. This defendant denies the averments of paragraph 34C of the complaint.

35. This defendant denies the averments of paragraph 35 of the complaint.

36A. This defendant denies the averments of paragraph 36A of the complaint.

36B. This defendant denies the averments of paragraph 36B of the complaint.

36C. This defendant denies the averments of paragraph 36C of the complaint.

36D. This defendant denies the averments of paragraph 36D of the complaint.

36E. This defendant denies the averments of paragraph 36E of the complaint.

Generally and in connection with paragraph 36A to E, [fol. 51] it is alleged that the defendant's practices, conduct and transactions in the operation of its business are in no manner unfair to its competitors or those with whom it deals, but on the other hand are beneficial to its customers, direct and ultimate, and to the economy of the country. By these practices, the defendant, among other things, provides low cost products, continuous employment and higher compensation to employees, and better and constantly improved articles for public consumption. The method in which defendant has conducted its business and still conducts its business is in large part responsible for these results. In equity there is no economic or other justification for this action.

Further Defense

37. Plaintiff for many years prior to the filing of the complaint has known or has had reasonable cause to know of the business practices, conduct and transactions of this defendant. Such knowledge has been acquired not only from general information but also through specific inquiries addressed to this defendant and through special and comprehensive investigations. Many of the business practices, conduct and transactions upon which the averments of the complaint assume to be based, occurred a decade or more ago and were fully known to the plaintiff either at the time of their occurrence or at least ten years before the institution of this action. For example, knowledge concerning the purchase by defendant of assets or property of others, referred to in paragraph 27 of the answer, came to plaintiff [fol. 52] at about the time of such purchases during the approximate period from 1926 to 1937.

38. Ten years before the date of the complaint the plaintiff made and concluded a full investigation of the existing and previous business practices, conduct and transactions of this defendant and in connection therewith subpoenas were issued at the request of the plaintiff to the defendant and complied with by supplying the material called for. Immediately thereafter the defendant considered that the whole matter was ended.

39. Subsequently the business practices, conduct and transactions of the defendant have not only been entirely legal, as they were before, but have also been conducted with such meticulous care as not to be subject to any just criticism of any kind. At no time prior to the filing of this complaint has the plaintiff claimed in any civil action that any of defendant's business practices, conduct and transactions has been unlawful as contended in the complaint herein or in any like manner.

40. In May, 1951, at the instance of the plaintiff, documents and witnesses were subpoenaed in connection with a Grand Jury investigation in this Court, some of these documents being those covered by prior investigations and subpoenas. It was apparent that the purpose of the investigation was to attempt to establish violation of law substantially upon the same contentions as are set forth in this complaint. The similarity between the matters presented to the Grand Jury and the transactions referred to in the complaint is illustrated by the fact that the plaintiff has [fol. 53] now asserted that it will seek to use in this action all or a substantial part of the documentary evidence subpoenaed in the Grand Jury proceeding.

41. The plaintiff presented voluminous evidence to the said Grand Jury over a period of approximately eighteen months. The Grand Jury completed its work in November 1952, and deliberately did not return an indictment or presentment. Despite the fact that the plaintiff's presentation was ex parte, and that this defendant had no opportunity to cross-examine or to present any defensive evidence, and despite the negative action of the 1951-1952 Grand Jury, the plaintiff has brought this present action on charges relating to alleged transactions extending back for decades and covering matters presented to the Grand Jury and known by the plaintiff for many years.

42. Over the period covered by the allegations of this complaint, that is, a period of twenty-five or thirty years prior to the institution of this action, documents which would be relevant to this action (including papers which plaintiff received many years before and has not returned to this defendant) have become unavailable, and persons whose testimony would be relevant to the defense of this action have died or have otherwise become unavailable. Furthermore, during the period covered by this complaint, with full knowledge of the plaintiff, many individuals have invested in the securities of the defendant, and the defendant itself has invested large sums of money in conducting its business.

43. For the reasons hereinabove stated, the claims and [fol. 54] charges now made by the plaintiff in this complaint are stale claims; and the institution of this action, after plaintiff's full knowledge over a long period of time, is unreasonably harassing and oppressive.

44. The defendant is informed and believes that the matters stated above clearly show that the charges of and relief sought in the complaint cannot be sustained either in law or in equity or in good conscience, and that the plaintiff is estopped from relitigating the matters set forth in the complaint.

45. The defendant is informed and believes and alleges that the matters stated above not only require an immediate and radical reduction in the time and scope of the matters properly to be considered in this action, but also constitute a complete bar to the complaint and the relief sought in the complaint.

Wherefore, having fully answered the complaint herein, defendant, The Procter & Gamble Company, demands that the relief sought by the plaintiff be denied and that judgment be entered dismissing the complaint, at plaintiff's costs.

DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY

[Title omitted]

ANSWER OF THE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN SOAP AND GLYCERINE PRODUCERS, INC.—Filed March 5, 1953

Comes now the Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc., a corporation, hereinafter designated as Defendant Association, by its Counsel, and makes this its Answer to the Complaint filed on behalf of the United States of America against it and other Defendants.

1. Defendant Association admits the allegation of Paragraph 1 of the Complaint to the effect that the Complaint was filed under Section 4 of the Act of Congress of July 2, 1890, c. 647, 26 Stat. 209, as amended, entitled "An Act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," commonly known as the Sherman Act, but denies that it has ever entered into, or in any way participated in, any unlawful contract, combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, as has ever monopolized, or attempted to monopolize, or combined, or conspired, with any of the other defendants herein, or with any other person or persons, to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, in the manner alleged in the Complaint herein, or that it has otherwise ever violated either Section 1 or Section 2 of the aforesaid Act in the manner alleged in the Complaint, or otherwise.

[fol. 58] 2. In answer to Paragraph 2, Defendant Association states that since no allegation therein made concerns this Defendant or its activities in any way, no further answer is required of it, but in any event it does not have knowledge or information sufficient to enable it to form any belief with respect to the truth of such allegations.

3. In answer to Sub-paragraphs A, B and C of Paragraph 3, Defendant Association states that since no allegation therein made concerns this Defendant in any way, no further answer is required of it, but in any event it does not have knowledge or information sufficient to enable it to form any belief with respect to the truth of such allegations.

In answer to Sub-paragraph D of Paragraph 3, the Defendant Association admits that it is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Delaware with its principal executive offices in New York, New York. Defendant Association further admits that it collects, from bulletins issued by the various departments of the Plaintiff, from daily newspapers and from trade journals, certain statistical information relating to the manufacture, sales, and use of soap, synthetic detergents, glycerine, and of materials used in the manufacture of soap and synthetic detergents and also of some kindred products and that the Association makes such information available to its members and to others. Defendant Association further admits that it collects from its members certain statistical information relating to the sale of soap and synthetic detergents, which information it subsequently distributes to its members and to others in summary form which does not reflect any specific information relative to any member's position, relatively or otherwise, with respect to the various fields of activity to which such statistical information pertains. Defendant Association denies that it coordinates the activities of any concerns engaged in the manufacture, sale, use and promotion of soap, synthetic detergents, glycerine, or of materials used therein or of any kindred products. Defendant Association denies that it represents any concerns engaged in the manufacture, sale, use and promotion of soap, synthetic detergents, glycerine, or of materials used therein or of any kindred products in their relations with others except to the extent that it does attempt to increase the good will for and public acceptance [fol. 59] of all soap, synthetic detergents and glycerine. Except as herein admitted specifically Defendant Association denies each and all of the allegations of Sub-paragraph 4 of Paragraph 3.

4. In answer to Paragraph 4, Defendant Association states that since no allegation therein made concerns this Defendant in any way, no further answer is required of it.

5. In answer to the first sentence of Paragraph 5, Defendant Association admits that soap has cleansing properties and that soap can be and is produced in the manner alleged but denies that soap is produced only in such manner. Defendant Association admits the allegations of the second and third sentences of Paragraph 5.

6. Since Paragraph 6 merely alleges the meaning which the Plaintiff applies to the word "soap" the Defendant Association states that it does not believe any answer with respect thereto is required of it, but it does not admit that such definition should be accepted as a correct definition. Defendant Association admits that the correct definition of the word "soap" includes, among others, the types of products named.

7. Defendant Association does not have information or knowledge sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations of Paragraph 7.

8. Since the first sentence of Paragraph 8 merely alleges the meaning which the Plaintiff applies to the term "household soap", the Defendant Association does not believe any answer with respect thereto is required of it, but does not admit that such definition should be accepted as constituting a correct definition. Insofar as the last sentence of Paragraph 8 is concerned, Defendant Association denies that the method of packaging, or the size thereof, or the distribution channel used, is a distinguishing characteristic as to whether soap will be used in the household or elsewhere.

9. Defendant Association is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations of Paragraph 9 and therefore denies all of such allegations except that it admits that in the 1920's chips and flakes were important types of packaged soap and that in the 1930's soap produced by the spray dry processes did become increasingly important.

[fol. 60] 10. Defendant Association admits that inedible tallow and grease are among the principal raw materials used in the production of soap. Insofar as the third sentence of Paragraph 10 is concerned, Defendant Association states that it is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to what the annual imports of inedible tallow and grease amounted to for the years 1926 through 1941, both inclusive, but also states, on information and belief, that since 1942 the annual imports of inedible tallow and grease, as publicly reported by various departments of the Plaintiff in the first instance and as subsequently reported by Defendant Association to its members and to others upon the authority of such government reports, has been less than 2 per cent of the domestic production for each such year except for the years 1942 through 1945, both inclusive. Insofar as the fourth and fifth sentences of Paragraph 10 are concerned, Defendant Association states that it is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief with respect to the truth of the allegations therein made except that it believes that no exchange exists, at present, for trading of inedible tallow or grease.

11. Defendant Association states, on information emanating from the Plaintiff, that it believes the allegations of Paragraph 11 are true.

12. Defendant Association states, on information emanating from the Plaintiff, that it believes the allegations of Paragraph 12 are true.

13. Defendant Association admits that synthetic detergents are cleansing agents, synthetized principally from petroleum derivatives, from derivatives of vegetable oils or from animal fats or oils or from combinations of such derivatives, but denies that the definition of such products as non-soap cleansing agents should be accepted as being a correct definition. Except as herein specifically admitted, Defendant Association denies the allegations of Paragraph 13.

14. Since Paragraph 14 merely alleges the meaning which the Plaintiff applies to the term "synthetic detergents" the Defendant Association states that it does not believe any answer with respect thereto is required of it, but it does not admit that such definition should be accepted as a correct definition.

[fol. 61] 15. Defendant Association is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations of Paragraph 15.

16. Since the first sentence of Paragraph 16 merely alleges the meaning which the Plaintiff applies to the term "household synthetic detergent," Defendant Association does not believe any answer with respect thereto is required of it, but it does not admit that such definition should be accepted as being a correct definition. Insofar as the second sentence of Paragraph 16 is concerned, the Defendant Association states, on information and belief, that the allegation therein contained is true. Insofar as the last sentence of Paragraph 16 is concerned, the Defendant Association denies that the method of packaging, or the size thereof, or the distribution channel used, is a distinguishing characteristic as to whether synthetic detergents will be used in the household or elsewhere.

17. Defendant Association is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations of Paragraph 17, except it does admit that synthetic detergents made from fatty alcohol derivatives first appeared on the market in the United States in the 1930's.

18. Defendant Association is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations of Paragraph 18.

19. Defendant Association admits that the usefulness of synthetic detergents is generally co-extensive with those of other soaps and that synthetic detergents may have certain performance advantages over other soaps in hard water. As to the last sentence of Paragraph 19, Defendant Association states that it is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations made therein.

20. Defendant Association is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations in Paragraph 20 that of the combined total dollar sales of household soap and household synthetic detergents in 1951 household soap constituted about 60 per cent and household synthetic detergents 40 per cent.

21. Defendant Association admits that glycerine may be a by-product of the manufacture of soap and that the ma-majority of glycerine is produced as an incident of soap production, but also avers that substantial amounts of glycerine are produced otherwise. Insofar as the last [fol. 62] sentence of Paragraph 21 is concerned, Defendant Association states that it is without knowledge or information to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations therein made.

22. Defendant Association admits that some types of soap which are used for household purposes have reached the consumer principally through the grocery stores and that, generally, synthetic detergents for household use have followed the same distribution channels. Defendant Association states that it is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegation in the third sentence of Paragraph 22 to the effect that at least two-thirds of household soaps and household synthetic detergents are bought by consumers from the shelves of self-service grocery stores. Defendant Association is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations of the fourth sentence. Defendant Association admits that industrial soap and industrial synthetic detergents are sold, in part, to the outlets mentioned in the last sentence of Paragraph 22.

23. Defendant Association is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations of Paragraph 23.

24. Defendant Association admits that various forms of advertising and promotional methods have been developed and used throughout the years to induce the purchase of soap. Some of these methods entitle the consumer to a credit in cash or in kind when purchasing specified items or a combination of items. Defendant Association is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to how the aforesaid advertising and promotional methods are used since its activities are in no way related to the retail distribution of soap or synthetic detergents. Except as herein admitted, the Defendant Association denies the allegation of Paragraph 24.

25. Defendant Association is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations of Paragraph 25.

26. Defendant Association is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations of Paragraph 26.

27. Defendant Association is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations of Paragraph 27.

28. Defendant Association admits that in 1926 there were no household synthetic detergents and that consequently [fol. 63] there were no producers of such products. In answer to the second sentence of Paragraph 28, Defendant Association states that it is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations contained therein.

29. Defendant Association is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations of Paragraph 29.

30. Defendant Association is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations of Paragraph 30.

31. In answer to Paragraph 31 Defendant Association states that since no allegations therein made concern this defendant, or its activities in any way, no further answer required of it, but in any event, it does not have knowledge or information sufficient to enable it to form any belief with respect to the truth of such allegations.

32. In answer to the first sentence of Paragraph 32, Defendant Association denies that it has engaged in, or participated in, any combination or conspiracy in restraint of, or to monopolize, any trade and commerce among the several states with respect to the production and sale of soap or synthetic detergents in violation of Section 1 or Section 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. Sections 1 and 2) or in violation of any other law of the United States of America, and further states that insofar as the allegations of such sentence apply to the other Defendants herein it does not have knowledge or information sufficient to enable it to form any belief with respect to the truth of such allegations. In answer to the second sentence of Paragraph 32, Defendant Association states that since no allegation therein made concerns this Defendant or its activities in any way, no further answer is required of it, but in any event it is without knowledge or information sufficient to enable it to form any belief with respect to the truth of such allegations. In answer to the third sentence of Paragraph 32, Defendant Association denies that it has committed violations of Sections 1 or 2 of the Sherman Act or of any other lawful statute of the United States of America under any circumstances whatsoever.

33. Defendant Association denies that it has participated in, or is now participating in, any combination, conspiracy, or continuing concert of action with any, or all, of the other Defendants herein, which has as its principal, or other [fol. 64] objectives the results set forth in Sections (1) and (2) of Sub-paragraph A of Paragraph 33 or as set forth in Sections (1) and (2) of Sub-paragraph B of Paragraph 33. Insofar as any activity on the part of Defendant Association is alleged in Paragraph 33 in its entirety, or in any of its Sub-paragraphs or Sections, Defendant Association specifically denies such allegations. Insofar as any activity, or activities, of other Defendants herein is alleged in Paragraph 33 in its entirety, or in any of its Sub-Paragraphs or Sections, Defendant Association is without knowledge or information sufficient to enable it to form any belief with respect to the truth of such allegations.

34. In answer to Paragraph 34, Defendant Association denies that it has assisted any of the other Defendants in doing any of the things described in Sub-paragraph 34-A, including all the numbered Sections and Sub-sections thereof, or in doing any of the things described in Sub-paragraph 34-B, including all the numbered Sections and Sub-sections thereof. Insofar as any activities of other Defendants herein are alleged or referred to in Sub-paragraph 34-A and Sub-paragraph 34-B, Defendant Association is without knowledge or information sufficient to form any belief with respect to the truth of such allegations.

35. Defendant Association denies that it has participated in any of the activities alleged in Paragraph 35, and states that so far as the other Defendants are concerned it is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of such allegations.

36. Defendant Association denies that it has ever engaged in any combination or conspiracy, with any or all of the other Defendants herein, or with anyone else, for the purpose of, or with the result of producing the effects specifically alleged in Sub-paragraphs A, B, C, D and E of said Paragraph 36. Insofar as any activities of the other Defendants herein are alleged or referred to in Paragraph 36, the Defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form any belief in respect to the truth of such allegations.

Wherefore, Defendant Association, having fully answered [fols. 65-66] the Complaint herein, requests that the Plaintiff's prayers in said Complaint, insofar as they involve this Defendant, be denied, and that the Complaint herein be dismissed as to this Defendant.

[fol. 67] IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY

ANSWER OF LEVER BROTHERS COMPANY—Filed March 5, 1953

Now comes Lever Brothers Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Maine (hereafter sometimes referred to as "this defendant"), one of the defendants in this action and, by its attorneys, answers the complaint as follows:

1. Answering Paragraph 1 of the complaint, this defendant denies that it has ever entered into, or in any manner become a party to, any agreement, combination or conspiracy of any kind whatsoever in violation of the laws of the United States and denies that it has been or now is a party to any unlawful contract, combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade, or to monopolize trade, or otherwise, in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C. §§ 1, 2).

[fol. 68] 3. Answering Paragraph 3 of the complaint, this defendant admits that Lever Brothers Company is made a defendant herein and that said company was incorporated in the State of Maine and maintains principal executive offices in New York, New York, and avers that it is without knowledge or information sufficient to admit or deny the allegations as to the other defendants named in Paragraph 3 of the complaint, except that it admits that the Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers collects and disseminates certain information for the general benefit of all those engaged in the manufacture, sale, and use of soap, synthetic detergents, glycerine and related products.

4. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to admit or deny the allegations of Paragraph 4 of the complaint, except that this defendant admits that it manufactures and sells soap, synthetic detergents, glycerine and other products.

5. This defendant avers that the definition of soap in Paragraph 5 is a matter upon which qualified experts differ. Since this defendant cannot admit the validity of the definition, the averments of this Paragraph 5 are denied.

6. Answering Paragraph 6, this defendant admits that the person signing the complaint intended that the word "soap" when used in the complaint should be given the meaning set forth in this paragraph.

7. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments contained in Paragraph 7 of the complaint.

[fol. 69] 8. Answering Paragraph 8 of the complaint, this defendant admits that the person signing the complaint intended that the term "household-soap" when used in the complaint should be given the meaning set forth in this paragraph, but this defendant alleges that the term "household-soap" is not used in the trade with the meaning ascribed to it in this Paragraph 8 and in the complaint; that the definition in this paragraph is misleading and inaccurate and that, accordingly, the use of the term "household-soap" throughout the complaint is misleading and inaccurate; and that this defendant does not accept, adopt, or approve for any purpose whatsoever the definition of the term "household-soap" in this paragraph or its use subject to this definition in the complaint. This defendant further specifically denies the allegation in the last sentence of Paragraph 8.

9. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments of Paragraph 9, except that it denies the last sentence thereof, and except that this defendant admits that since the late 1920's laundry bar soap has become increasingly less important as a cleansing agent.

10. Answering Paragraph 10 of the complaint, this defendant admits that inedible tallow and grease are principal raw materials used in the production of soap, and are rendered primarily from fat scrap cut from meat by butchers and meat processors, but avers that it is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the other averments of said paragraph.

[fol. 70] 11. This defendant admits the averments of Paragraph 11 of the complaint.

12. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments of Paragraph 12.

13. This defendant avers that the definition of synthetic detergents in Paragraph 13 is a matter upon which qualified experts differ, and that the definition as stated is inaccurate and incomplete. Since this defendant cannot admit the validity of the definition, the averments of this Paragraph 13 are denied.

14. Answering Paragraph 14 of the complaint, this defendant admits that the person signing the complaint intended that the words "synthetic detergents" when used in the complaint should be given the meaning set forth in this paragraph.

15. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments contained in Paragraph 15 of the complaint.

16. Answering Paragraph 16 of the complaint, this defendant admits that the person signing the complaint intended that the term "household-synthetic-detergents" when used in the complaint should be given the meaning that is set forth in the first sentence of this paragraph. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments of the second sentence in this paragraph. This defendant denies the averments of the last sentence of this Paragraph 16.

17. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments of Paragraph 17 of the complaint.

[fol. 71] 18. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments contained in Paragraph 18 of the complaint.

19. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments of Paragraph 19 of the complaint except that it admits that synthetic detergents have some of the same uses as soap.

20. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments of Paragraph 20.

22. Answering Paragraph 22 of the complaint, this defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments of Paragraph 22 of the complaint, except that it admits that, among other outlets, soaps and synthetic detergents are distributed to consumers through grocery stores, and that distribution of such products has been made direct to grocers as well as through jobbers or wholesalers, and that industrial soaps and synthetic detergents are sold to a variety of purchasers.

[fol. 72] 23. Answering Paragraph 23 of the complaint, this defendant denies each and every averment of Paragraph 23, except that it admits that in self-service grocery stores the consumer generally serves himself and that in non-self-service grocery stores the clerk generally serves the commodities which the customer desires. This defendant denies, however, that the classification of grocery stores as "self-service" and "non-self-service" is either accurate, complete or reliable and avers that many grocery stores are in part self-service and in part non-self-service.

24. This defendant denies the averments of Paragraph 24 of the complaint, except that it admits that it has developed and used throughout the years various methods of advertising and promotion to encourage the purchase of its brands of soap and synthetic detergents in competition with the brands of other manufacturers. Defendant further avers that these methods are varied and diverse.

25, 26, 27 and 28. This defendant is without information or knowledge sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments in Paragraphs 25, 26, 27 and 28 of the complaint.

29. This defendant is without information or knowledge sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments in Paragraph 29 of the complaint, except that this defendant admits that its expenditures for 1951 for advertising and promotion of its soap and synthetic detergents were approximately $27,000,000 including therein all elements which are included in defendant's accounting procedures.

[fol. 73] 30. This defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments in Paragraph 30 of the complaint.

31. Answering Paragraph 31 of the complaint, this defendant is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments of said paragraph, except that this defendant admits that it has manufacturing plants engaged in producing, and sales offices engaged in selling, soaps and synthetic detergents to purchasers in states other than the states in which the said plants and sales offices are located.

32, 33, 34 and 35. This defendant denies each and every averment of Paragraphs 32, 33, 34 and 35, and each subparagraph thereof, of the complaint insofar as those averments relate to this defendant, and otherwise avers that it is without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the averments of said paragraphs.

36. This defendant denies each and every averment contained in Paragraph 36 of the complaint. Further answering Paragraph 36, this defendant avers that in the manufacture and sale of soap and synthetic detergents and in the purchase of inedible tallow and grease and all other raw materials it is engaged in the keenest competition with all other manufacturers and sellers of such products; that it has continuously invested substantial sums in research and development designed to improve the quality of its products; that it has speedily made available the results of its research and development; that it has continuously maintained a sales policy designed to bring to wholesale and retail distributors the widest variety of its products of the highest possible quality at the lowest possible price; and that the result of such policies has been to provide competition with the products of other manufacturers at all levels of distribution and to bring to [fol. 74] consumers soap products and synthetic detergents of superior quality at low competitive prices. It further avers that such policies have conferred substantial benefits upon the suppliers of raw materials used in the manufacture of soap products and synthetic detergents, upon distributors, and upon the consumers of those products. This defendant further specifically denies that it is or has been a party to any combination or conspiracy or that its actions or the effects thereof may be considered in conjunction with the actions or effects thereof of any of the other defendants, and avers that it is informed and believes that from on or about June 1, 1951, to November 30, 1952, attorneys for the plaintiff Department of Justice presented to a grand jury convened in this district vast amount of testimony and documentary evidence relating to precisely the same subjects that are alleged in this complaint and that said grand jury refused or failed to return an indictment.

Affirmative Defense

37. In recent years and particularly since the end of World War II in 1946, the nature and character of the business in which this defendant is engaged has sharply changed in terms of types of products, manufacturing processes and facilities, competitive position and marketing policies and practices. These changes are due in part to the introduction of synthetic detergents, changes in products resulting therefrom and from other factors, [fol. 75] changes in the structure and characteristics of distribution outlets, general economic factors and many other causes. These changes have been accompanied by changes in the position, policies and practices of this defendant.

38. This defendant's management, including both its Board of Directors and all of its executive officers in charge of marketing or purchasing, is composed entirely of persons who have been officers of the Company for only a few years. None of the present directors of the defendant was either a director or an executive officer of the defendant prior to July, 1949. The President and chief executive of the defendant was elected to his position on May 2, 1950, and was not connected with the defendant prior to that date. Since the middle of 1946, the management of the defendant has undergone two complete reorganizations extending throughout the policy-making levels of the organization. Not a single person who prior to July, 1949, was a president or vice president of the defendant, or head of any of its divisions dealing with the buying of raw materials or the selling of finished products, is now serving with the defendant in any capacity.

39. This defendant does not occupy a dominant position in the soap and synthetic detergent industry and its share therein is relatively subordinate and has decreased in recent years (Complaint, Paragraphs 25 and 26). According to the complaint, in 1951, this defendant's share of the total sales of synthetic detergents was only ten percent (Complaint, Paragraph 26), and its share of the total sales of soap and soap products was 21 percent (Complaint, Paragraph 25). Each of defendant's products competes [fols. 76-77] with products of other manufacturers; many different products of different manufacturers are available and compete for the same uses; and defendant is and has been in no position to restrain competition or to monopolize, alone or in combination with others, with respect to raw materials or finished product and defendant has not and does not attempt to do so.

40. Since the complaint is based in essential part upon events long prior to the changes alleged in the foregoing, it fails to state a claim upon which relief could be granted even if it were assumed, which we deny, that except for such changes the allegations of the complaint could be proved and relief granted thereon.

Wherefore, this defendant prays that the relief sought by the plaintiff be denied, that judgment be entered for this defendant, that the complaint be dismissed, and that and that it be granted such other and further relief as may be warranted.

bia Bar), J. T. Welch, of counsel.

[fol. 113] Mr. Royall:

[fol. 114] Finally, your Honor, we call attention to the fact that at the end of eighteen months the Grand Jury failed to render a true bill and immediately thereafter a representative of the Department of Justice stated that while he would not say what happened before the Grand Jury, yet no one in the Justice Department was unhappy over the action of the Grand Jury.

The Court: Who said that, Brother Smith?

[fol. 115] Mr. Smith: Your Honor, the General asked me how I felt at the time the complaint was to be filed, said, "Can you say what has happened?" I said, "I can't say what has happened. I am not unhappy." But I didn't intend to cast great implications in any direction. Certainly it is improper for me at any time to say what happens. I was asked; I wouldn't and shan't, unless your Honor orders me to, reveal.

The Court: I guess nobody cares down there whether you were happy about the outcome or not.

Mr. Smith: I didn't know anybody was. I thought it was a fairly casual comment.

The Court: Well, did you really try to get an indictment?

Mr. Smith: Your Honor, if your Honor please, I—

The Court: I presented cases to Grand Juries for years when I was a prosecutor.

Mr. Smith: I know, sir.

The Court: There are two ways of presenting cases.

Mr. Smith: I don't like to reveal anything that transpires there, and that is a very considered view, not only of my own, sir, but of my superiors, that we must maintain that if your Honor does not—

The Court: I asked you a simple question, did you try to get an indictment. It calls for a simple answer, yes or no.

[fol. 116] Mr. Smith: Does your Honor think—does your Honor desire me to answer what happened within the Grand Jury?

The Court: No. You presented the evidence with a view to getting an indictment, is that right?

Mr. Smith: Your Honor, I presented the evidence and presented it in substantial detail. It seems to me that the ultimate fact as to what happened in the end result of the Grand Jury requires a revelation of what was said within the room and done within the room. I think your Honor doesn't want me to answer that.

The Court: No, I do not.

Mr. Smith: I stated clearly and I state again, your Honor, that I was instructed to and did carry on an investigation to determine had there been criminal violations. That is the primary determination that has to be made, whatever other action is taken, and I do not in any way admit that the sole object, as was indicated a couple of times in the papers for the defendant, was a civil case. I was starting to consider whether your Honor wanted me to go back into a discussion of the nature of the law.

The Court: No.

Mr. Smith: Does that answer your question?

The Court: It certainly does. I knew that is the way you would answer it. If you get a poor witness on the stand who doesn't answer yes or no right away, he is [fols. 117-144] badgered to death. But when I ask a lawyer, I get a long-winded answer all the time.

Mr. Smith: Does your Honor—

The Court: I don't want any more explanation. I know you can't reveal what went on. I asked you whether you tried to get an indictment. That is a simple question. It is either yes or no, because that will dispose of the General's contention that you only used the Grand Jury processes to get the necessary information to proceed civilly. He makes it quite clear that that is what he thinks. And I asked you a simple question whether you presented the evidence and tried to get an indictment.

Mr. Smith: Your Honor, the proceedings were initiated and—

The Court: If you can't answer yes or no, Mr. Smith, just say so.

Mr. Smith: I think I shouldn't, sir.

The Court: All right, sir, that is all. Thank you.

[fol. 146] OPINION—Filed May 11, 1953

The plaintiff, the United States of America, moves this court for an order requiring the defendant, Procter & Gamble Company to produce certain documents, a list of which is attached as Exhibit A to the moving papers, for inspection, copying, and photographing. It will be treated like any other motion under Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

° Rule 34 provides:

“Upon motion of any party showing good cause therefor * * * the court in which an action is pending may (1) order any party to produce and permit the inspection and copying or photographing, by or on behalf of the moving party, of any designated documents, papers, books, accounts, letters, photographs, objects, or tangible things, not privileged, which constitute or contain evidence relating to any of the matters within the scope of the examination permitted by Rule 26(b) and which are in his possession, custody, or control * * * .”

Rule 26(b) generally provides: The deponent may be examined regarding any matter, not privileged, which is relevant to the subject matter involved, and it is not ground for objection that the testimony will not be admissible at the trial if the testimony sought appears reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence. How any judge can foretell the latter result with any certainty is beyond me.

The government is required to show good cause; that the material is not privileged; and constitutes or contains evidence relating to the subject matter in the pending litigation.

The purpose of this rule is to make relevant and non-privileged documents in the possession of one party available to the other. The rule is to be literally construed. Baron & Holtzoff, Vol. 2, pp. 484, 485.

[fol. 147] In a prior criminal proceeding against several defendants, one of whom was Procter & Gamble Company who here opposes the motion to produce, the government sought these same papers and documents through grand jury subpoenas. The defendant objected, and after lengthy argument by counsel and careful deliberation by the court, Judge Forman granted the government's demand for the documents.

Defendant's counsel, both in his brief and in his argument before the court, attacks the decision in the criminal proceeding. I must remind counsel that that proceeding is not before this court. This court does not sit in review of the Chief Judge or any other judge of this district. The defendant was given ample opportunity to present his arguments before Judge Forman, whose decision indicates that the documents were necessary for the purposes of establishing the government's case.

Defendant argues that the plaintiff had possession of the documents here requested for a year and a half and has made copies and notes of them. Thus, defendant says "it would seem obvious that plaintiff is already in possession of the information sought and has no cause for production under Rule 34."

The obvious answer to this is found in defendant's "brief in opposition to plaintiff's motion for production by defendant, The Procter & Gamble Company, of documents pursuant to Rule 34 of the Rules of Civil Procedure," paragraph 29 of the affidavit of defendant's attorney, Kenneth C. Royall. He states, " * * * in this civil case in which for the first time in a definite adversary action an effort is made to use the Grand Jury documents, Procter contends that these documents were illegally obtained and cannot in this proceeding be used or ordered produced." From defendant's affidavit it would appear that the government was well advised to seek production of these documents anew in this cause to avoid the objections voiced by defendant's attorney, rather than depend upon the previous [fol. 148] possession in the criminal action. Indeed, in the Application of Bendix Aviation Corporation, 58 F. Supp. 953 (S.D. N.Y. 1945), where a subpoena was served upon defendant to produce voluminous documents at an inquest of a grand jury regarding a violation of the anti-trust laws, the court directed the government to return the documents. The government was required to apply for an order impounding the documents before they could be used in the subsequent civil action.

The documents sought, about 800 in number, are identified by numbers placed upon them by defendant when it produced them pursuant to the grand jury subpoenas. The court has not seen these documents nor did the defendant ever submit them for the court's inspection. The government's attorney filed a statement under oath that the exhibits " * * * are relevant or material to the issues of this cause and are needed to aid the plaintiff in the preparation of its case * * *." The fact that Judge Forman felt after extended hearings that the same documents were pertinent to the government's case in the criminal proceedings lends strong support to plaintiff's statement. Nothing which defendant's counsel has stated in his brief or his arguments before this court indicates otherwise.

Defendant argues that the government instituted criminal proceedings only as a means to the end of gaining information to be used in this civil proceedings; such use of subpoena power is illegal; and that, therefore, the documents sought cannot be used in a civil action brought by the government. No authority is cited by defendant in support of the proposition, and the court unable to find such authority does not take this to be the rule. Government's counsel stated in affidavit form that the purposes of the investigation were, first, determination whether there were violations of Sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Sherman Act or any of them, or of any other Federal anti-trust laws, and, second, determination as to what action should be [fols. 149-150] taken to enforce those laws through criminal proceedings, civil proceedings or both. He further stated that the investigation and all proceedings incident to it, including the grand jury proceedings, were begun and carried on pursuant to and within instructions to accomplish those purposes. It is not for the court to criticize this procedure by a refusal to allow production of the documents requested.

The government's motion is granted.

An order may be submitted in conformity with the opinion herein expressed.

ORDER GRANTING MOTION FOR DISCOVERY AND PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS—May 27, 1953

The plaintiff having moved this Court for an order pursuant to Rule 34 of the Rules of Civil Procedure requiring the defendant, The Procter & Gamble Company, to produce and permit the inspection and copying by photostating or other appropriate means by plaintiff of certain documents in the possession, custody or control of the defendant; and said motion having come on to be heard on March 25, 1953; and the Court having heard argument of counsel and being fully advised, and having rendered its opinion, which was filed with the Clerk of the Court May 11, 1953, and having determined that said documents are relevant for the purposes of Rule 34, it is Ordered, that the motion of plaintiff be and it hereby is granted, and that the said defendant prepare for and deliver to plaintiff, as hereinafter provided, copies (by photostating or other appropriate means) of such documents listed in the plaintiff's motion herein as plaintiff shall from time to time designate to the defendant (but such designation shall in no event be later than such date as is set by the Court terminating exercise of general rights of discovery by the parties to this case); within two weeks after such designation or within such other time after such designation as may be agreed upon, defendant shall deliver to plaintiff at the United States Attorney's Office, Newark, New Jersey, or the Attorney General's [fol. 152] Office in Washington, D. C., as plaintiff may elect, so many photostatic copies of each such document as plaintiff shall designate (such photostats, unless otherwise agreed to, to be made by a reputable photostater in Cincinnati, Ohio as to minute books, in New York City as to other documents, such photostater to be designated by the plaintiff), the cost of such photostating to be borne by plaintiff; and it is further

Ordered, that plaintiff may inspect such originals of the said documents listed in plaintiff's motion herein as plaintiff may from time to time designate; documents so designated shall be produced by defendant at the office of Dwight, Royall, Harris, Koegel & Caskey, 100 Broadway, New York, New York, or at the Office of Dinsmore, Shohl, Sawyer & Dinsmore, 1218 Union Central Building, Cincinnati, Ohio, at defendant's election, within ten days after receiving the request for such inspection (but such designation and inspection shall in no event be later than such date as is set by the Court terminating exercise of general rights of discovery by the parties to this case); and it is further Ordered, that defendant may have its exception to this order and to any findings or conclusions in this order or in the opinion.

Dated May 27th, 1953.

MOTION FOR RETURN OF COPIES AND OTHER WRITINGS—Filed
June 4, 1953

The defendant, The Procter & Gamble Company (hereinafter sometimes called "Procter"), respectfully shows to the Court as follows:

As more fully appears in the affidavit and brief filed simultaneously herewith, plaintiff, illegally it is contended, made and transported to Washington, D. C. copies, notes, etc. of documents submitted by Procter pursuant to subpoenas duces tecum to a certain Grand Jury sitting in this District in 1951 and 1952, and discharged on November 25, 1952, and both legal and practical reasons exist for ordering their return. The documents, of which the copies, notes, etc. were made, are the same as those which were the subject matter of an order entered by this Court in this case on May 27, 1953, on plaintiff's motion under Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

[fol. 154] Procter therefore moves this Court for an order requiring plaintiff and its counsel to deliver to Procter all copies of, all excerpts from, and all notes, analyses, summaries and other writings concerning the documents which are the subject of the order of this Court on plaintiff's motion under Rule 34, entered on May 27, 1953.

AFFIDAVIT—Filed June 4, 1953

STATE OF NEW YORK,
County of New York, ss:

KENNETH C. ROYALL, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

1. I am a member of the firm of Dwight, Royall, Harris, Koegel & Caskey, one of the attorneys for the defendant, The Procter & Gamble Company (hereinafter sometimes called "Procter").

2. This affidavit is made on behalf of Procter in support of Procter's motion dated June 4, 1953, for an order requiring the plaintiff and its counsel to return to Procter all copies of, all excerpts from, and all notes, analyses, summaries and other writings concerning certain documents hereinafter referred to.

3. Procter had submitted these same documents, pursuant to subpoenas duces tecum as modified by order of Judge Forman of this Court, to a certain Grand Jury sitting in this District in 1951 and 1952. Such order of Judge Forman was not appealable or reviewable by Procter.

[fol. 158] 4. The Grand Jury was discharged on November 25, 1952, without returning any indictment against Procter or any other person or corporation in this antitrust matter. After considerable delay the plaintiff finally returned all these documents to Procter on March 10, 1953.

5. On May 27, 1953, pursuant to a motion made by the plaintiff herein under Rule 34 and opposed by Procter, this Court ordered Procter to deliver to the plaintiff copies of such of these documents as the plaintiff shall designate. Procter has no present right of appeal from or review of this order of May 27 and at this stage of this action is bound thereby.

6. As is fully set forth in my prior affidavit of March 17, 1953, submitted in opposition to plaintiff's motion under Rule 34 (which affidavit is hereby incorporated and made a part hereof), Judge Forman, during the hearings on the motions to quash the said subpoenas duces tecum, ruled that the documents to be submitted should be retained in rooms provided in the Federal Building, Newark, New Jersey, and counsel for the Government acquiesced. Nevertheless, in violation of this ruling, as we contend, counsel for the Government caused copies and notes, etc. of certain of the said documents to be made and to be taken to Washington, D. C., where they would normally have been handled or seen by persons not directly concerned with the Grand Jury proceedings.

7. It is alleged that the plaintiff has no right to retain these copies and other writings. Procter has on several occasions—two since the filing of the instant complaint and once since the order of May 27, 1953—demanded return of all such copies, notes, excerpts, analyses, summaries and [fol. 159-162] other writings concerning the said documents. However, plaintiff has absolutely refused to return any of these copies and other writings.

8. In addition to enforcing Procter's legal right to such copies, notes, excerpts, analyses, summaries and other writings, a practical purpose will also be served in that the possession of these writings by Procter would obviate in many instances the necessity of photostating particular documents under this Court's order of May 27, 1953, and would eliminate the time and trouble thereby required, since the returned copies, after being noted, could be delivered to plaintiff in lieu of additional photostats.

9. Granting of this motion would also give Procter information to which it is entitled and would tend to expedite the disposition of this case by indicating to Procter which of the said documents covered by the order of May 27, 1953 are and have been deemed by plaintiff to be so pertinent to plaintiff's contentions herein as to justify plaintiff's copying, noting, analyzing or summarizing. In this connection, Procter has as yet had no indication from plaintiff of any specific documents, from the large mass produced, which are deemed by plaintiff either to be relevant in this proceeding or to be those upon which plaintiff intends to rely in this proceeding.

10. No previous application for the same relief or for relief similar to that sought herein has been made. Procter opposed plaintiff's motion under Rule 34, partly on grounds similar to some of those set forth herein, but different issues were involved in that motion.

(S.) Kenneth C. Royall.

Sworn to before me this 4th day of June, 1953.

MOTION TO SUPPRESS CERTAIN DOCUMENTS—Filed June 4,

The defendant, The Procter & Gamble Company (hereinafter sometimes called "Procter"), respectfully shows to the Court as follows:

On grounds similar to those urged by Procter in its brief and affidavit opposing plaintiff's motion under Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and as set forth in the affidavit and brief filed simultaneously herewith, Procter moves this Court for an order forbidding plaintiff from using against Procter in this case for any purpose prior to or during trial

(1) all documents submitted by Procter to the Grand Jury sitting in this District in 1951 and 1952 and listed in plaintiff's said motion dated March 6, 1953,

[fol. 164] (2) all copies of, all excerpts from, and all notes, analyses, summaries and other writings concerning any of the documents referred to in (1) above, and

(3) all papers, documents, and other like evidence obtained, directly or indirectly, by reason of information or knowledge derived wholly or partially from the papers mentioned in (1) and (2) above.

For like reasons and for the further reason that the other defendants in this action are jointly charged by plaintiff with jointly combining and conspiring with Procter in violation of the antitrust laws, Procter submits that plaintiff should not be entitled to use against Procter documents obtained from the other defendants during the Grand Jury proceedings and therefore moves this Court for an order forbidding plaintiff from using against Procter in this case for any purpose, prior to or during trial

(1) all documents submitted by the defendants other than Procter to the said Grand Jury, or to plaintiff pursuant to subpoenas duces tecum,

(2) all copies of, all excerpts from, and all notes, analyses, summaries and other writings concerning any of the documents referred to in (1) above, and

(3) all papers, documents and other like evidence obtained, directly or indirectly, by reason of information or knowledge derived wholly or partially from the papers [fol. 165] mentioned in (1) and (2) above.

Procter contends that papers obtained by plaintiff from all persons, firms, corporations and other entities, other than the defendants in this case, should for like reasons be suppressed in so far as any use is attempted to be made of them against Procter and because they were obtained by what amounted to a pre-trial discovery proceeding of which Procter had no notice and no opportunity to appear. Procter therefore moves this Court for an order forbidding plaintiff from using against Procter in this case for any purpose, prior to or during trial

(1) all documents submitted by any person, firm, corporation or other entity, other than the defendants, to the said Grand Jury or to plaintiff, pursuant to subpoenas duces tecum,

(2) all copies of, all excerpts from and all notes, analyses, summaries and other writings concerning any of the documents referred to in (1) above, and

(3) all papers, documents and other like evidence obtained, directly or indirectly, by reason of information or knowledge derived wholly or partially from the papers mentioned in (1) and (2) above.

AFFIDAVIT—Filed June 4, 1953

STATE OF NEW YORK,

KENNETH C. ROYALL, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

1. I am a member of the firm of Dwight, Royall, Harris, Koegel & Caskey, one of the attorneys for the defendant, The Procter & Gamble Company (hereinafter sometimes called "Procter").

2. This affidavit is made on behalf of Procter in support of Procter's motion, dated June 4, 1953, for an order forbidding plaintiff from using in this case against Procter for any purpose, prior to or during trial, the documents and papers described in the said motion.

3. As is more fully set forth in my affidavit of March 17, 1953, submitted in opposition to plaintiff's motion in this cause under Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which affidavit is incorporated by reference herein and made a part hereof.

[fol. 170] (a) Procter, as well as the other defendants herein and various other persons, firms and corporations, were served with subpoenas duces tecum commanding production of various categories of documents before a Grand Jury which sat in Newark, New Jersey, in 1951 and 1952.

(b) The said subpoenas, even as modified by order of Judge Forman of this Court, were so broad, sweeping, vague and indefinite as to be unreasonable, unduly burdensome and oppressive and thus to constitute an abuse of process and an illegal search and seizure. The documents submitted pursuant to said subpoenas were therefore illegally obtained and cannot be used for any purpose against Procter in this proceeding.

(c) The Government utilized the Grand Jury proceeding for the purpose of preparing for this civil action and in order to evade the protective requirements of the rules governing discovery in civil actions. The circumstances establishing such an abuse of process are fully set forth in my prior affidavit of March 17, 1953.

(d) The orders and instructions of Judge Forman, made during the hearings on the motions to quash the Grand Jury subpoenas were not complied with by the Government in many respects, including

(i) the failure of the Government to return the documents promptly to Procter and, instead, the retention of them until March 10, 1953, over three months after the Grand Jury was discharged on November 25, 1952, and approximately three months after the civil complaint was filed, and

(ii) the making of copies, notes, etc. of many of said documents and the taking of such copies, notes, etc. to [fols. 171-174] Washington, D. C., despite the rulings of Judge Forman that the documents should be kept in certain rooms in the Federal Building in Newark, New Jersey.

4. The documents submitted by Procter pursuant to the said subpoenas duces tecum are the same as those which are the subject of this Court's order of May 27, 1953, on plaintiff's motion under Rule 34. Procter has been granted an exception to the said order and will at the proper time take such exception.

5. By reason of the abuses of process described in my prior affidavit and summarized herein, I submit that the documents obtained in the said Grand Jury proceeding should be suppressed and that plaintiff should be forbidden to use against Procter in this case for any purpose prior to or during trial the documents described in this motion.

6. No previous application for the same relief or for relief similar to that sought herein has been made. Procter opposed plaintiff's motion under Rule 34 partly on grounds similar to those set forth herein but the issue on that motion and the relief sought by the plaintiff were different from the issue herein and relief here sought by Procter, and such issue could not properly be raised and such relief could not properly be sought on a motion under Rule 34.

(S.) Kenneth C. Royall.

Sworn to before me this 4th day of June, 1953.

STIPULATION FOR INSPECTION AND COPYING BY DEFENDANTS OF CERTAIN THIRD PERSON DOCUMENTS—Filed July 15, 1953

Whereas the defendants in the above-styled case have sought permission to inspect and copy certain documents or copies of documents which are in the possession of the attorneys for the plaintiff for use in preparation for trial and which were obtained from and are records of persons, firms or corporations who are not parties to the above-styled case (sometimes hereinafter referred to as "third persons"); and

Whereas the third persons whose names appear in Exhibit A attached hereto have stated that they have no objection to the inspection and copying by or on behalf of the said defendants of the documents or copies of documents now in possession of the attorneys for the plaintiff which were obtained from said third persons whose names appear in Exhibit A;

It is hereby stipulated and agreed, subject to the approval of the Court, by and between the attorneys for The Procter & Gamble Company, Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Company, Lever Brothers Company, and The Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc., defendants, and [fol. 194] each of them, on the one part, and the attorneys for the United States, plaintiff, on the other, that

The defendants, or any of them, may inspect the said documents or copies of documents of the said third persons whose names appear in Exhibit A, at the Department of Justice Building in Washington, District of Columbia, or at the United States Court House in Newark, New Jersey (whichever attorneys for plaintiff in each instance specify), at a time or times to be agreed upon between attorneys for the parties, and each defendant may obtain such photostats of said documents (whether originals or copies) as it may from time to time designate in writing to the attorneys for the plaintiff, such copies to be prepared by a photostater or photostaters to be agreed upon by the attorneys for the parties and to be furnished to such defendant at the defendant's expense, within a reasonable time after receipt by the attorneys for plaintiff of each written designation; and that

The inspection and copying of such documents of said third persons provided for herein shall be without prejudice to the right of any party to seek and obtain further discovery pursuant to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and without prejudice to the positions of either the plaintiff or the defendants as to the propriety of the plaintiff having such documents or copies thereof in its possession or as to [fol. 195] the admissibility of either the documents or copies thereof as evidence in this case.

Civil Action No. 1196-52

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Plaintiff,

VS.

THE PROCTER & GAMBLE COMPANY, COLGATE-PALMOLIVE-PEET COMPANY, Lever Brothers Company and The Asso-

defendants.

OPINION—Filed January 14, 1954.

MONDARELLI, District Judge.

This is a suit under Section 4 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act (15 U.S.C.A. § 4), which Act has been called "A Charter of Freedom" by Chief Justice Hughes who wrote the unanimous opinion in Appalachian Coals, Inc. v. U. S., 288 U.S.

344, 360, which charter was required because of the nationalization of business in the United States. The defendant Procter & Gamble Company (hereinafter called Procter) has filed two motions; the first one entitled "Motion for return of copies and other writings"; and the second one "Motion to suppress certain documents." The motions were submitted upon briefs and affidavits of Procter and the plaintiff, oral argument having been waived by counsel for both parties.

The defendant does not move under any rules of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, nor does it cite any persuasive authority for these unique motions. The identical documents covered by these motions are the same as those which were submitted by Procter, pursuant to a subpoena duces tecum, to a grand jury sitting in this District in 1951 and 1952, and again the subject matter of an order entered by this court in this case on May 27, 1953, on plaintiff's motion under Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure [fol. 199] duce. United States v. Procter & Gamble Co., et al., 14 F.R.D. 230. The movant seeks to eliminate from the case the documents which twice have been ordered produced by two District Court Judges.

Movant argues that an "abuse of process" by the Department of Justice has so tainted the documents that the "only effective remedy for such abuse is to prohibit use by plaintiff against Procter for any purpose in this case of any of the documents and papers referred to in the motion." But what was the abuse of process? The process used by plaintiff was a subpoena duces tecum, which is properly used when the Department of Justice, charged by law with the duty of enforcing the antitrust laws, invokes it for the purpose of obtaining documents to be presented to a grand jury investigating possible violations of the law. The Department never saw any of the documents until Procter complied with a subpoena duces tecum issued at the outset of the criminal investigation; and the documents upon which the motions are based are the same documents that will be used by the plaintiff in the current civil action if the motions are denied. But even assuming arguendo that it is wrongful to issue a subpoena duces tecum solely for the purpose of obtaining evidence for use in a subsequent civil suit, Procter has not cited any authority in support therefor. The Fourth and Fifth Amendments to the Constitution are not pertinent to the motions herein.

In essence, Procter's argument is that evidence obtained by wrongful conduct should be excluded from a case. Assuming that such a general proposition is the law, in what way was plaintiff's conduct wrongful? Defendant asserts that the subpoena duces tecum was issued in bad faith in that plaintiff never really sought an indictment, but, that lacking the subpoena power, it used the criminal investigation as a pretense for obtaining documents upon which to base a civil case. The assertion has not been substantiated and is referred to in this opinion not because [fols. 200-201] proof thereof would persuade the court to order the documents suppressed as evidence. Recently, however, a large segment of the Bar has complained that the Department of Justice has misused the grand jury in order to subpoena documents under color of criminal investigation, not looking toward an indictment, but seeking information upon which to base a civil action. If such conduct could be proved, the proper remedy is not the granting of this type of motion, which would probably result in an insurmountable obstacle to any civil action, but by a direct attack at the outset of the criminal investigation. Indirect deference does not outweigh enforcement of the antitrust laws. If the court were to grant these motions, would it not, in effect, forever bar a civil action? And would not the principle of law be that where documents are produced by a party pursuant to a subpoena duces tecum for consideration by a grand jury and thereafter the documents returned, no indictment having been found, as was the case here, and subsequently a civil action is commenced by the United States against the same party and the same documents are produced pursuant to Rule 34, that nevertheless the United States must deliver to that party its "work product" based on the documents and all evidence therefrom must be suppressed. There is no authority or precedent for such proposition, nor does this court believe that should be the law.

Motions denied.

- 1) tetrasodium pyrophosphate and sodium tripolyphosphate
- 2) finished synthetic detergents.

E) construction by the supplier during the period January 1, 1946 to June 30, 1954 of production or processing facilities for synthetic detergent base materials or phosphates.

F) negotiations during the period January 1, 1946 to June 30, 1954 for processing for the Company of synthetic detergent base materials obtained from third parties.

9. With respect to the production of synthetic detergents, and plans therefor, all production schedules and estimates, analyses and estimates of base material requirements, and sales estimates, plans and projections for the period from January 1, 1946 through December 31, 1948, together with all memoranda and correspondence relating thereto and prepared, sent or received during, or covering such period.

10. All contracts, agreements, and amendments thereto between the Company and any seller of synthetic detergent petroleum base materials, including but not limited to sulfonated and unsulfonated alkylated hydrocarbons, by which the Company agreed to purchase:

- a) the seller's output of any type or types of synthetic detergent base
- b) stated percentages of the seller's output of any type or types of synthetic detergent base
- c) amounts of synthetic detergent base to be delivered over a period of time

[fol. 213] and which were in effect at any time during the period January 1, 1949 through June 30, 1954.

11. With respect to all price changes on household soap and household synthetic detergents, effectuated during the period from January 1, 1946 to June 30, 1954; all memoranda and correspondence prepared, sent or received during, or covering, such period, recommending, approving or authorizing such changes, or setting forth or relating to:

- c) January, 1948
- d) September and November, 1950
- e) January, 1951
- f) December, 1953

and as to each such purchase the date, weight, grade, price per pound, f.o.b. point, delivery point, terms and conditions of sale, name and address of the seller, name of the broker (if any), and amount of any commission paid by the Company and the name and address of the recipient thereof.

[fol. 214] 14. All contracts or agreements, and amendments thereto between the Company and any seller of tallow or grease which were in effect at any time during the years 1951 through 1953, inclusive, and which called for delivery to the Company for a period of three months or more of:

- a) the total amount of any grade or grades of the seller's tallow or grease
- b) stated amounts of any grade or grades of the seller's tallow or grease.

15. All memoranda instructions, or correspondence prepared, sent or received during, or covering the periods from January 1, 1939 through December 31, 1941, and from January 1, 1947 through June 30, 1954, concerning purchases of tallow or grease and referring to prices, withholding or disclosure of prices, supplies, purchases by other buyers, timing of purchases, any bonus or system of paying bonuses to suppliers for better quality tallow or grease, and/or market studies and analyses.

16. All memoranda and correspondence prepared, sent or received during, or covering, the years 1947 through 1951 inclusive and referring

- a) to the termination or the proposed termination of the "official New York market price" for tallow or grease; and
- b) to the criteria to be employed in determining the price of tallow or grease.

17. A) The tri-party Agreement establishing brand quotas or other limitations on the advertising and promotional expenses of each of the participants, which was entered into by the Company, Procter & Gamble, and Lever Brothers in or about January, 1938.

B) All reports, memoranda and correspondence relating to the negotiations which were commenced on or about January 12, 1938 between representatives of the Company, and Procter & Gamble and/or Lever Brothers which resulted in the tri-party Agreement described in sub-paragraph A) supra.

[fol. 215] C) All memoranda and correspondence relating to the tri-party Agreement of 1938 described in sub-paragraph A) supra, or to meetings of representatives of the Company, Procter & Gamble and/or Lever Brothers, regarding details of this Agreement.

19. A) Records showing Sales Promotion and Free Goods Deals, Summary of Advertising, Sales Promotion and Free Goods Deals, and Departmental Advertising expenditures in each sales division and sales district by months from January 1, 1952 through June 30, 1954 for each of the Company's brands of household soap and household synthetic detergent products.

B) Records showing expenditures in each sales division, district and city for each type of brand sales promotion for which total expenditures are recorded in the records referred to in sub-paragraph A) supra, by months, from January 1, 1935 to December 31, 1941, and from January 1, 1946 to June 30, 1954, for each of the Company's household soap and household synthetic detergent products.

19. All memoranda and correspondence prepared, sent or received during, or covering, the periods from January 1, 1937 to December 31, 1942, and from January 1, 1946 to June 30, 1954, relating to the discontinuance or limitation, or the proposed discontinuance or limitation, by the Company, Procter & Gamble, Lever Brothers, and/or any other manufacturer, of one-cent sales, other special sales, special factory packs, premiums, or special advertising allowances (including count and recount sales plans) in any city, state, or region of, or throughout, the United States.

20. All competitive activity reports of the Company showing the cities, towns, and other larger and smaller territories in which other manufacturers couponed, offered con-

[fol. 216] sumer deals, or engaged in other promotional activities, for the years 1935 through 1939 inclusive and 1946 through June 30, 1954 inclusive.

21. Records showing for each sales district, and for each sales unit or lesser sales area for which such records are kept

a) number of coupons of each type

b) number of special packs of each type distributed for each of the Company's brands of household soap and household synthetic detergents during each year, quarter, and month or other period for which such records were compiled from January 1, 1946 to June 30, 1954.

22. All market surveys, tabulations, charts, memoranda, and correspondence relating to the planning, objectives, conduct or results of each of the following promotional campaigns, without limitation to documents relating only to the Districts or regions specified, if such Districts or regions constituted only part of the area in which the promotional campaign was being conducted:

- 1) Concentrated Super Suds and Palmolive mail couponing campaign which was commenced in or about February, 1939.
- 2) Concentrated Super Suds and Palmolive house-to-house couponing campaigns which were being conducted in or about February, 1939 in Summit, New Jersey, Little Rock, Houston, Shreveport, Savannah, and Jacksonville.
- 3) Concentrated Super Suds and Palmolive special factory promotion pack which was being conducted in or about March, 1939 in Buffalo and in sections of New York City.
- 4) Palmolive free goods consumer deal campaigns (one cake of Palmolive offered free with purchase of Concentrated Super Suds) which were being conducted in June, 1939 in Jonesboro, Arkansas, Eldorado, Arkansas, Alexandria, Louisiana, and New Orleans.
- 5) Concentrated Super Suds "Cannon household cloth" premium promotions which were being conducted in June, 1939 in Philadelphia and Wilkes Barre, Pennsylvania.

- 6) Concentrated Super Suds flower-seed premium promotions which were being conducted in or about February, 1939 in Elizabeth, New Jersey, Pittsburgh, Bethlehem and Easton, Pennsylvania.

[fol. 217] 7) Palmolive, Super Suds, Cashmere Bouquet and Ajax multi-brand couponing campaign which was commenced in or about September, 1947.

- 8) Kirkman Flakes couponing campaigns which were being conducted in or about August, 1947 in the Boston and Philadelphia districts and regions.

- 9) Vel one-cent sale promotions which were being conducted:

- a) in or about January, 1939 in Dayton, Ohio; and

- b) in or about February, 1939 in Lima, Ohio.

- 10) Vel silk hosiery premium promotions which were being conducted in or about May, 1939 in South Bend, Indiana and Peoria, Illinois.

- 11) Vel half-price sale promotion which was being conducted between the Allegheny Mountains and the Pacific Coast in or about May, 1947.

- 12) Vel couponing campaigns which were being conducted:

- a) in or about May, 1947 in Plainfield and Milburn, New Jersey, and Youngstown, Ohio; and

- b) in or about June, 1947 in Flint, Michigan.

23. A) Records (or copies of reports) showing sales of soap and synthetic detergents by product categories as reported to the Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc. for the period from January 1, 1952 through June 30, 1954.

B) Records (or copies of reports) showing sales and shipments of soap and synthetic detergents by product categories as submitted to the Bureau of Census of the United States Department of Commerce for the period January 1, 1952 through June 30, 1954.

[fol. 219] AFFIDAVIT IN SUPPORT OF MOTION

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, SS.

Joseph E. McDowell, being first duly sworn, says, upon information and belief:

That he is an attorney for the United States Department of Justice and is engaged in the preparation of this case on behalf of the United States of America, the plaintiff herein.

The pleadings herein pose two broad issues: (1) whether the defendants have been engaged since 1926 in a continuing combination and conspiracy to restrain and to monopolize trade and commerce among the several States in the production and sale of household soap and household synthetic detergents, in violation of sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act; and (2) whether the defendants Procter, Colgate and Lever are now monopolizing and, for at least fifteen years prior to the filing of this complaint, have continuously monopolized such trade and commerce, in violation of section 2 of the Sherman Act.

The scope and nature of these issues is indicated in the numerous specific allegations set forth in the complaint concerning concerted activities of the defendants in furtherance of their objectives. Pursuant to the defendant's purpose [fol. 220] pose to restrict and control competition and to attain and exploit positions of dominance over all others engaged in producing and selling household soap and synthetic detergents, it is alleged that Procter, Lever, and Colgate have employed the following means, among others:

- (1) exchanging information concerning prices, terms and conditions of sale, advertising and promotional methods, raw materials and other details of their business;
- (2) controlling and fixing prices at which their brands are sold by themselves and by retailers;
- (3) controlling and regulating their use of advertising and promotional methods;
- (4) sharing by cross licenses to the exclusion of others, significant patents and patent rights;

- (5) employing methods of couponing, special deals and other promotional devices designed to secure advantages for the defendants' brands in the allocation of retail shelf space and to obstruct the promotion and sale of household soap and synthetic detergents produced by other manufacturers;
- (6) inducing principal producers of base materials for synthetic detergents to concentrate upon the production of these materials for sale to Procter, Lever, and Colgate and to discontinue or curtail production of synthetic detergents;
- (7) restricting and controlling competition in the production and sale of glycerine by curtailing production, fixing prices, and exchanging information;
- (8) exchanging information concerning raw material purchases, prices, and supplies;
- (9) obtaining discriminatory preferences over other purchasers of raw materials used in the production of soap;
- (10) making "confidential deals" in which prices are concealed in order to avoid affecting published market prices or the market positions of other buyers and sellers;
- (11) manipulating and fixing prices at which they purchase inedible tallow and grease and other raw materials; and
- (12) purchasing and agreeing to purchase substantially all of the available supplies of petroleum base materials used in the production of synthetic detergents.

The documents and records described in the accompanying motion either relate directly to specific issues thus posed or must be examined in connection with relevant questions [fol. 221] concerning the defendant's power and purpose to monopolize. All of such documents and records are in the possession of the Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Company, or subject to its control, if they are in existence at this time. With minor exceptions, all of these are either supplementary to documents and records previously furnished by the Company, or relate to matters with respect to which substantial information has already been furnished by the Company and the other defendants herein in the course of the investigation of the soap and synthetic detergent industry conducted by the Department of Justice prior to the institution of this action.

Proof of the unlawful activities with which this defendant is charged necessarily involves the careful accumulation of all relevant documentary material.

The production of the documents and records described in the attached motion is necessary to the preparation of the case and will expedite the determination of the issues and the disposition of the cause.

17. A) The tri-party Agreement establishing brand quotas or other limitations on the advertising and promotional expenses of each of the participants, which was entered into by the Company, Colgate-Palmolive-Peet, and Procter & Gamble in or about January, 1938.

B) All reports, memoranda and correspondence relating to the negotiations which were commenced on or about January 12, 1938 between representatives of the Company and Colgate-Palmolive-Peet and/or Procter & Gamble which resulted in the tri-party Agreement described in sub-paragraph A) supra.

C) All memoranda and correspondence relating to the tri-party Agreement of 1938 described in sub-paragraph A) supra, or to meetings of representatives of the Company, Colgate-Palmolive-Peet and/or Procter & Gamble, regarding details of this Agreement.

18. A) Records showing Advertising and Sales Promotion Costs (or Merchandising Costs) in Totals and Per Case by Divisions, Advertising and Adjusted Sales [fol. 246] Plan Expenditures, and Advertising Expense Allowance, showing advertising and promotional expenditures in each sales division and sales district by months from January 1, 1952 through June 30, 1954, for each of the Company's brands of household soap and synthetic detergent products.

B) Records showing expenditures in each sales division, district and city for each type of brand sales promotion for which total expenditures are recorded in the records referred to in sub-paragraph A), supra, by months, from January 1, 1935 to December 31, 1941, and from January 1, 1946 to June 30, 1954, for each of the Company's household soap and household synthetic detergent products.

19. All memoranda and correspondence prepared, sent or received during, or covering, the periods from January 1, 1937 to December 31, 1942, and from January 1, 1946 to June 30, 1954, relating to the discontinuance or limitation, or the proposed discontinuance or limitation, by the Company, Colgate-Palmolive-Peet, Procter & Gamble, and/or any other manufacturer, of one-cent sales, other special sales, special factory packs, premiums, or special advertising allowances (including count and recount sales plans), in any city, state, or region of, or throughout, the United States.

20. All competitive activity reports of the Company showing the cities, towns, and other larger and smaller territories in which other manufacturers couponed, offered consumer deals, or engaged in other promotional activities, for the years 1935 through 1939, inclusive, and 1946 through June 30, 1954, inclusive.

21. Records showing for each sales district, and for each sales unit or lesser sales area for which such records are kept

- a) number of coupons of each type
- b) number of special packs of each type

distributed for each of the Company's brands of household [fol. 247] soap and household synthetic detergents during each year, quarter, and month, or other period for which such records were compiled from January 1, 1946 to June 30, 1954.

22. All market surveys, tabulations, charts, memoranda, and correspondence relating to the planning, objectives, conduct or results of each of the following promotional campaigns, without limitation to documents relating only to the regions specified, if such regions constituted only part of the area in which the promotional campaign was being conducted:

1) Rinso couponing campaigns which were being conducted.

- a) in or about May, 1950 in the Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, Minneapolis, Baltimore and Pittsburgh regions; and
- b) in or about September, 1949 in the Memphis, New Orleans, Richmond, Cincinnati, Boston, Philadelphia and Syracuse regions.

[fol. 249] AFFIDAVIT IN SUPPORT OF MOTION

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

JOSEPH E. McDOWELL, being first duly sworn, says upon information and belief:

That he is an attorney for the United States Department of Justice and is engaged in the preparation of this case on behalf of the United States of America, the plaintiff herein.

The pleadings herein pose two broad issues: (1) whether the defendants have been engaged since 1926 in a continuing combination and conspiracy to restrain and to monopolize trade and commerce among the several States in the production and sale of household soap and household synthetic detergents, in violation of sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act; and (2) whether the defendants Procter, Colgate and Lever are now monopolizing and, for at least fifteen years prior to the filing of this complaint, have continuously monopolized such trade and commerce, in violation of section 2 of the Sherman Act.

The scope and nature of these issues is indicated in the numerous specific allegations set forth in the complaint concerning concerted activities of the defendants in furtherance [fol. 250] of their objectives. Pursuant to the defendants' purpose to restrict and control competition and to attain and exploit positions of dominance over all others engaged in producing and selling household soap and synthetic detergents, it is alleged that Procter, Lever, and Colgate have employed the following means, among others:

- (1) exchanging information concerning prices, terms and conditions of sale, advertising and promotional methods, raw materials and other details of their business;

- (2) controlling and fixing prices at which their brands are sold by themselves and by retailers;
- (3) controlling and regulating their use of advertising and promotional methods;
- (4) sharing, by cross licenses to the exclusion of others, significant patents and patent rights;
- (5) employing methods of couponing, special deals and other promotional devices designed to secure advantages for the defendants' brands in the allocation of retail shelf space and to obstruct the promotion and sale of household soap and synthetic detergents produced by other manufacturers;
- (6) inducing principal producers of base materials for synthetic detergents to concentrate upon the production of these materials for sale to Procter, Lever, and Colgate and to discontinue or curtail production of synthetic detergents;
- (7) restricting and controlling competition in the production and sale of glycerine by curtailing production, fixing prices, and exchanging information;
- (8) exchanging information concerning raw material purchases, prices, and supplies;
- (9) obtaining discriminatory preferences over other purchasers of raw materials used in the production of soap;
- (10) making "confidential deals" in which prices are concealed in order to avoid affecting published market prices or the market positions of other buyers and sellers;
- (11) manipulating and fixing prices at which they purchase inedible tallow and grease and other raw materials; and
- (12) purchasing and agreeing to purchase substantially all of the available supplies of petroleum base materials used in the production of synthetic detergents.

The documents and records described in the accompanying motion either relate directly to specific issues thus [fol. 251] posed or must be examined in connection with relevant questions concerning the defendants' power and purpose to monopolize. All of such documents and records are in the possession of Lever Brothers Company, or subject to its control, if they are in existence at this time. With minor exceptions, all of these are either supplementary to documents and records previously furnished by the Company, or relate to matters with respect to which substantial information has already been furnished by the Company and the other defendants herein in the course of the investigation of the soap and synthetic detergent industry conducted by the Department of Justice prior to the institution of this action.

Proof of the unlawful activities with which this defendant is charged necessarily involves the careful accumulation of all relevant documentary material.

The production of the documents and records described in the attached motion is necessary to the preparation of the case and will expedite the determination of the issues and the disposition of the cause.

W., Washington 5, D. C.

SIRS:

Please take notice that the undersigned will bring the within motion on for hearing before this Court at the Federal Building, Newark, New Jersey, on the 25th day of [fol. 266] October, 1954, at 10 a.m., or at such other time as the Court may order.

Dated: September 24, 1954.

Defendant, the Procter & Gamble Company.

[fol. 267] MOTION FOR ORDER DIRECTING DISCLOSURE OF GRAND JURY TRANSCRIPTS—Filed September 24, 1954.

The defendant, The Procter & Gamble Company (hereinafter called "Procter") respectfully moves the Court, pursuant to the discovery provisions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and in accordance with the powers of this Court to act in the interest of justice with respect to litigation pending before it, for an order granting leave to Procter and its counsel to inspect and copy, commencing within ten (10) days after the entry of the order herein, the following documents or papers which are either in the possession or control of plaintiff and its counsel or are otherwise within the control of this Court:

The transcripts of the testimony of all witnesses taken before the Grand Jury of the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey sitting in Newark from May 1951 to November 1952 in connection with an investigation of possible antitrust law violations in the soap and synthetic detergent industry. (See proceeding numbered Cr. [fol. 268] 174-51, 175-51; 176-51, 177-51.)

In support of this motion Procter shows to the Court, inter alia:

(a) The Grand Jury transcripts record testimony taken in connection with an investigation of whether there were violations of the antitrust laws by the movant and other members of the soap and synthetic detergent industry.

(b) The said transcripts plus the documents obtained by Grand Jury subpoena have been available to and used by the plaintiff in preparation for the instant civil action.

(c) Under orders issued in this case on May 27, 1953, and January 14, 1954, plaintiff, over protest of Procter, has been permitted to retain and use in this civil action documents and information produced in the Grand Jury proceeding which were obtained without the notice provided and the method prescribed for all parties by the Civil Rules and the Statutes.

(d) On the other hand, Procter has not had access to the Grand Jury transcripts, or to other information produced before the Grand Jury.

(e) The said Grand Jury was discharged on November 25, 1952, without returning any indictments against Procter or the other defendants and there is no pending criminal proceeding involving the evidence produced before the Grand Jury. The names of most if not all of those who appeared and testified before the said Grand Jury in connection with the investigation of the soap industry have been known for many months and it is believed that witnesses would have no objection to disclosure of their testimony. Procter does not seek to discover the deliberations or the votes of any Juror. No need exists for preserving the [fol. 269] secrecy of the said Grand Jury transcripts.

(f) The information contained in the Grand Jury transcripts is necessary to Procter for an adequate preparation of its defenses to this action, and is relevant to the matters alleged in the complaint. The relevancy of such transcripts in this civil action is supported by the fact that plaintiff, pursuant to Rule 34, sought and obtained from Procter in this action the same documents which were produced by Procter before the said Grand Jury.

(g) Matters pertinent to Procter's defenses will never become known to Procter unless access to the Grand Jury transcripts is granted by this Court. Denial of such access would be unjust, discriminatory and prejudicial to Procter in this case and would be violative of the spirit and meaning of the Statutes and Rules and would deprive Procter of due process and equal protection of the laws and would be, therefore, violative of Amendment V of the Constitution of the United States.

At an appropriate time, when Procter believes it is in a position to frame requests of proper scope, Procter intends to move under Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for leave to inspect and copy documents and papers, in the possession or control of plaintiff, which were produced pursuant to the Grand Jury subpoenas as well as other documents and papers in the possession or control of plaintiff.

Dated: September 24, 1954.

TRANSCRIPT OF HEARING

1. Hearing on motion and amended motion for discovery
as to Lever Bros. Co.

2. Hearing on motion and amended motion for discovery
as to Procter & Gamble Company.

3. Hearing on motion and amended motion for discovery
as to Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Company.

Before the Honorable Alfred E. Modarelli, U.S.D.J.

[fol. 330-332] Mr. McDowell:

[fol. 333] Now, I would like to add, your Honor, that while it is true substantial numbers of documents were produced in response to Judge Forman's sustaining of those grand jury subpoenas, Judge Forman seriously limited, very substantially limited the production sought, and in many, many instances the production was placed upon a sample basis, for partial periods, and it was specifically and expressly contemplated by Judge Forman that the grand jury—the Government would have to come back, if it was ever able to get through the matter within the period available before the grand jury, that it might have to come back for more documents to fill in some of these periods, to complete the picture partially disclosed by some of the documents [fol. 334] which were out, apparently, in the space of time allowed, and he would say, "Well, I have to let it go. I can't figure what that would come to without a machine."

But, your Honor, I have made no effort to check the performance on those documents which were ultimately ordered to be produced by Judge Forman as against those staggering estimates. But one little example just happened to come to my—one case happens to have come to my attention in the examination of fabrications of contracts with respect to the purchase of tallow and grease. I had noticed some estimate of that, so I went back and looked it up in the transcript. I have a note of it here. But a member of counsel had made the estimate that for his company alone the number of—I'm sorry, your Honor; would you bear with me just a moment till I get this figure here? His company alone—the number of these contracts involving the purchase of tallow and grease which would have to be produced for each year, or might have to be produced for each year, would run between seven hundred and fifty and a thousand contracts. And when you multiply the pages in the contracts, and so forth, and the number of years involved, it looked like a very substantial number. And it is, no question about it.

Now, in actual fact, the tabulation which I originally [fol. 335] made available.

And that is, precisely our situation, your Honor. We are here in the posture where, notwithstanding the fact that admittedly many, many thousands, perhaps the million mentioned, of documents have been produced, and yet, as was specifically recognized by Judge Forman, there are gaps, there are inadequacies, there are places where the sample is too small to let sufficient conclusions be drawn, and yet large enough to indicate the necessity of further examination.

There are cases where the figures are incomplete. For example, on one item where we had asked for promotional expenditures, advertising and promotional expenditures, we first got just advertising from one of the companies, the grand jury went back on a later subpoena, and then it got the promotions from the same company. But in neither case—in the first case the advertising was broken down by divisions, which is extremely significant, because local marketing areas play a very important factor in this industry. But notwithstanding the two grand jury returns the material as supplied, upon full examination, discloses that it is not broken down to the divisions.

So we have to come back, your Honor. We have issues to which that is material, and which require that the Gov[fols. 336-855] erminent examine this matter before it can undertake to furnish—I come back to your Honor's point now—if I may—before we can undertake to do any more than cooperate in some informal discussion of the matter.

Before The Honorable Alfred E. Modarelli, U.S.D.J.

[fols. 863-865] Mr. Royall:

[fols. 866-879] Your Honor, a third point relates to the Government's answers to some of the questions propounded. As your Honor recalls, you allowed some questions, for the present did not allow others—not precluding them coming up later, but at this time did not allow them.

Without seeking to get into an argument about it, we think in several particulars the Government failed to answer adequately even the questions as limited by your Honor. And we want to make it clear that our consent to the form of the proposed judgment does not indicate our approval of their answers, or the sufficiency of them; nor does it preclude, of course, Procter, and the other defendants, from seeking from the Court future orders relating to the questions which your Honor for the present did not require to be answered.

[fols. 884-1129] One of my concerns is that since plain-or longer, how long must we wait for defendants to prepare their case? The sooner defendants are informed of plain-tiff's factual contentions, the sooner defense preparation can commence—and not before, obviously.

MOTION FOR AN ORDER DIRECTING DISCLOSURE OF GRAND JURY TRANSCRIPTS—Filed November 25, 1955

The defendant, The Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc. (hereinafter called "the Association"), respectfully moves the Court, pursuant to the discovery provisions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and in accordance with the power of this Court to act in the interest of justice with respect to litigation pending before it, for an order granting leave to the Association and its counsel to inspect and copy the following documents or papers which the Association believes to be either in the possession or control of plaintiff and its counsel or are otherwise within the control of this Court:

The transcripts of the testimony of all witnesses taken before the Grand Jury of the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey, sitting in Newark from May 1951 to November 1952 in an investigation of possible anti-trust law violations in the soap and synthetic detergent industry.

[fol. 1133] If the Court should be of the opinion that the entire transcript of testimony before the Grand Jury, together with the exhibits introduced in evidence, should not be made available to the defendant Association, then the Association prays for an order permitting it and counsel to inspect the testimony and pertinent exhibits before the Grand Jury of such witnesses as will give their consent to the defendant Association's seeing and examining their testimony.

In support of this motion, the Association shows to the Court:

(a) The transcripts of testimony before the Grand Jury as above set forth contained testimony taken in connection with an investigation to determine whether there were violations of the antitrust laws by the Association and other members of the soap and synthetic detergent industry.

(b) The Association asserts, on information and belief, that said transcripts and exhibits obtained by Grand Jury subpoena have been available to and used by the plaintiff in preparation for the instant civil action.

(c) The plaintiff has been permitted to retain and use in the preparation of the instant case documents and information of the Association produced in the Grand Jury proceedings. On information and belief, the Association asserts that the plaintiff has also been permitted to retain and use in the instant case all other documents and information produced in the Grand Jury proceedings.

(d) On the other hand, the Association has not had access to the Grand Jury transcripts or to other information produced before the Grand Jury.

(e) The said Grand Jury was discharged on November 25, 1952, without returning an indictment against the Association or the other defendants in this action and there is [fol. 1134] no pending criminal proceeding involving the evidence produced before the Grand Jury. The Association believes that the names of most, if not all, of the witnesses who appeared and testified before the said Grand Jury have been known for some time. It is believed that many, if not all, of the witnesses would have no objection to disclosure of their testimony.

(f) It is of the utmost importance to the Association that the information contained in the Grand Jury transcript be made available to it for the preparation of its defense in the instant case and that the testimony of many, if not all, of the witnesses before the Grand Jury as well as the documents introduced in evidence are relevant to the matters alleged in the complaint in the instant case. The relevancy of such transcripts in the instant case is supported by the fact that the plaintiff sought and obtained from the Association in this case the same records of the Association which were produced by it before the said Grand Jury.

(g) The Association believes that many matters pertinent to its defense in the instant case will never become known to it unless access to the Grand Jury transcripts is granted by this Court. Under the circumstances, as related herein, denial of such access would be unjust, discriminatory and prejudicial to the Association in the instant case and would be violative of the spirit of the applicable statutes and rules and would deprive the Association of due process and equal protection of the laws and would be, therefore, violative of Amendment V of the Constitution of the United States.

MEMORANDUM IN LIEU OF BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF MOTION FOR AN ORDER DIRECTING DISCLOSURE OF GRAND JURY TRAN-SCRIPTS—filed November 25, 1955.

Counsel for each of the three corporate defendants announced in open Court on November 14, 1955, that they would file briefs in support of motions similar to the motion filed on behalf of the defendant, Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc. In view of the fact that there will be three briefs before the Court on the question whether all of the transcript of testimony before the Grand Jury or the transcript of testimony of such witnesses as may give their consent, it seems useless to burden the Court with a fourth brief. We therefore state, that we rely on briefs filed by the three corporate defendants in support of the motion of the defendant association.

MOTION FOR DISCLOSURE OF WITNESSES APPEARING BEFORE
GRAND JURY AND TRANSCRIPT OF THEIR TESTIMONY—Filed
November 29, 1955.

The Defendant Lever Brothers Company respectfully moves the Court for an order.

A. Requiring the plaintiff to disclose to said defendant the names of the witnesses appearing before the grand jury of the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey sitting in Newark from May 1951 to November 1952, investigating possible antitrust law violations in the soap and synthetic detergent industry (proceeding numbered Criminal 174-51, 175-51, 176-51, 177-51), and

B. Requiring the plaintiff to permit defendant to inspect and copy the grand jury transcript of the testimony of such witnesses or, in the alternative, of such witnesses appearing before such grand jury as consent to the disclosure of their testimony.

The grounds for this motion are that (1) no privilege of secrecy attaches to the testimony of a witness before the grand jury; (2) Lever Brothers Company is urgently in need of access to such testimony in order to discover in this [fol. 1148-1149] civil proceeding the evidentiary basis, if any, for the charges in the complaint and to prepare its defense to such charges; and (3) no practicable alternative to such discovery exists under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure because to attempt to obtain such discovery through depositions of such witnesses would necessarily involve substantial cost and severe inconvenience to all parties, would gravely retard the expeditious preparation of this cause for trial, and would not in any event produce accurate information because of the lapse of time and other factors.

Respectfully submitted, Bailey, Schenck & Bennett, ark, New Jersey. Arnold, Fortas & Porter by

STATEMENT BY THE COURT

The Court: Gentlemen, before we start the arguments, I have the usual preliminary thoughts which I always get together in the hope that it will save us all time, you and the Court, and focus the argument. I want to compliment you all on the briefs. They certainly are thorough and very carefully prepared. I wish I could always say that for lawyers.

Of course, you all realize that the motion is not without its special complex problem. Counsel should base their oral argument upon these comments, which are the result, as I said, of the excellent quality of the briefs. Especially interesting was Colgate's analysis relating to the Department of Justice's alleged misuse of the grand jury subpoena. Today's arguments by the defendants mainly should be a reply to the recent brief dated December 7, [fol. 1254] 1955, submitted by the plaintiff; and plaintiff's argument mainly should be a rebuttal of defendants' oral arguments. As a result I should have clearly defined areas of dispute.

We are concerned here with four separate motions by defendants for orders compelling the plaintiff to produce for inspection and copying the transcripts of the testimony of all the witnesses who appeared before the grand jury; or, in the alternative, apparently all defendants request the production of the transcripts of the so-called consenting witnesses.

Lever also requests the names of the witnesses, and the Association requests "exhibits." I think this is the first request made by the Association.

Unless counsel now are able to persuade me otherwise—and I am always open to conviction, gentlemen—I shall limit these motions to the request relating to the testimony of all witnesses, and if that is denied, the testimony of consenting witnesses.

Now, does Lever really need a list of the names of the witnesses?

As for the mysterious "exhibits" asked for by the Association, no defendant has made any argument relating to them.

The grand jury conducted hearings in this district from May, 1951, until November 25, 1952. It investigated [fol. 1255] possible criminal violations of the Federal antitrust laws, but returned no indictment. The civil complaint commencing this action was filed on December 11, 1952, less than three weeks after the grand jury finished its hearings, the Thanksgiving intervening.

I have reached tentative conclusions as to certain arguments, so now I suggest that counsel re-examine them in the light of the following comments.

First, Colgate's motion is under Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and every brief discusses that rule. However, Criminal Rules 1 and 54(a)(1) expressly provide that the Criminal Rules govern the procedure in all criminal proceedings, with the exceptions stated in Rule 54, none of which applies, in my opinion, to this civil action. Thus my current view is that Rule 6(e) does not give me authority to grant these motions. However, the rule and the cases decided thereunder are pertinent to show the approach to the problem of the extent of grand jury secrecy in criminal cases.

Second, I suggest that no one refer either to Judge Learned Hand's or Judge Medina's famous remarks in the Garsson and Morgan cases. The remark of Judge Hand has been taken out of its context and, I believe, applied too broadly; also, the problem before him was not the same as the one I now have.

[fol. 1256] Judge Medina's remarks were made without the benefit of argument and he gave no reason for his decision.

The thorough briefs submitted on this motion have given me sufficient discussion and leads to discussions so I do not intend to decide this perplexing question upon the basis of those remarks, even though they were made by two outstandingly eminent Judges.

Third, I don't believe I can get any help from the cases where the courts refused to allow examination of the grand jury transcripts for the purpose of attacking the indictment. For example, in United States v. Violon the defendant's purpose was to prove the indictment was based upon insufficient evidence; in United States v. Gouled the purpose was to prove the grand jury considered illegal evidence; and one or both of these reasons were involved in United States v. Morse, United States v. Herzig, United States v. Oley, Shushan v. United States, United States v. Papaioanu and United States v. Amazon.

Also, United States v. Procter & Gamble Company,

Metzler v. United States, United States v. Cohen, United States v. Crolich involved special circumstances arising in the context of a criminal case. Moreover, in none of these criminal cases was the liberal discovery policy of the civil rules involved at all, nobody ever referred to them. Maybe they didn't have to, in those cases.

[fol. 1257] Fourth, the result of the General Motors case is pertinent, but didn't the court rely too much upon the Garsson and similar criminal cases?

Fifth, plaintiff's argument beginning at the bottom of page 19 of its December 7, 1955 brief appears to beg the question in that even assuming the legal correctness of that argument relating to the departmental regulation prohibiting disclosure of documents of a confidential character, the issue is whether the grand jury transcripts are of such a nature. Of course, if I decide that they are, then I would have to deny the motions.

Sixth, I will not consider the Darling case cited by the plaintiff unless I have a copy of the opinion. Of course, that goes for the Government's adversaries, too.

Now, I should like to put several questions to counsel. You need not write these. I have prepared copies of this and my plan is to give them to you and you will have time to read them over and digest them.

(1) Mr. McDowell, do you object to submitting a detailed affidavit stating exactly (a) what use, if any, plaintiff has made in the past of the grand jury transcripts while preparing for the trial of this case; (b) what use, if any plaintiff intends to make of the transcripts during its future preparation for the trial; (c) what use, if any, plaintiff in [fol. 1258] tends to make of the transcripts during the trial.

(2) I would like all of defendants' counsel to tell me exactly how the production of grand jury transcripts would materially aid their trial preparation.

(3) What is the status of the Herzog case in which Mr. Justice Douglas wrote an opinion on a preliminary question? If the Supreme Court files an opinion on the merits, will it be helpful to me regarding this problem?

(4) Does Wigmore support defendants' contentions in that he concludes grand jury testimony only temporarily is privileged secret matter? Is that a fair conclusion based on his statement in Section 2362: "There remain therefore, on principle, no cases at all in which after the grand jury's functions are ended, the privilege of the witnesses not to have their testimony disclosed should be deemed to continue."

I shall not refer specially to each of the many arguments made by both sides. Instead I shall state what I believe is a summary of the arguments. It is very important for counsel to comment both upon its accuracy and its completeness, for to render the proper decision I prefer to have a workable, accurate, complete statement summarizing the arguments. Here is my summary, subject to correction:

"The general rule is that grand jury testimony is not [fol. 1259] subject to disclosure; but there are exceptions to that rule. The exceptions are based upon the desire of the courts to reach substantially just result in a case if the five reasons traditionally given for secrecy are not applicable to the facts involved. Now this Court is asked to add another exception, namely, when the plaintiff, United States has had access to and perhaps has used and will continue to use—of course, the affidavit will disclose the facts, if one is submitted by Mr. McDowell—will continue to use grand jury testimony to prepare its case prior to a civil trial, and perhaps will use that testimony during the trial, and that testimony relates to the same subject matter and the same parties involved in the civil action, for the purpose of discovery and use at the trial, the defendants have a right to inspect and copy that testimony—well, the idea of that is clear, that if the Government used it, has used it and intends to use it at trial then do the defendants have the right to inspect that transcript, or that portion which the Government used—or do public policy and the enforcement of the criminal antitrust laws outweigh such an asserted right?

Finally—this is interesting and coincidental—there is now on trial in this very building the case of the United States of America v. Grunstein, et al. It involves the Federal Government's attempt to recover damages from a [fol. 1260] meat packing company for alleged fraudulent sales of meat to the armed forces. In that case, on November 6, 1953, one of the defendants' interrogatories was:

"10. State whether plaintiff will use any testimony given before the grand jury in the criminal action involving the corporate defendant and the defendant William Grunstein, and, if so, deliver a copy of the same to the defendants or make available such testimony for inspection by the defendants."

It is close enough to our question to be very interesting. As a result of that interrogatory Judge Hartshorne now has before him—on reserved decision—a question similar to the one now before me. However, in that case the defendants do not seek carte blanche authorization for a random examination of the grand jury minutes resulting in the indictment against the present defendants in the civil suit; and the request for discovery is limited to those portions of the minutes which plaintiff plans to use at the trial for certain purposes indicated to the Court. Judge Hartshorne will probably file a written opinion, so I suggest counsel carefully consider its applicability to this motion and perhaps submit supplemental briefs on the specific question that was raised in Grunstein, where they directly asked, specifically, for the portions of the transcripts they [fol. 1261] wanted, not an overall inspection of the entire transcript, they specified what they want. And it has been argued before Judge Hartshorne. He reserved decision, and I had hoped that he would have it decided by now, but I guess he is having his troubles with the question, too. So I guess we will all admit that the question is not without great difficulties, and particularly on consideration of public policy.

Of course, I realize that you can't copy all this down, so I prepared copies of it, and I thought I would give one to each of the counsel. And I will take a recess. You go over it and make your own notes; and then we will come back and I will hear argument.

My only purpose is this, gentlemen—I don't want you to think that I want to limit you unnecessarily—but I feel that, if I can save your time and mine, and pinpoint the argument, that that is the desirable thing to do.

Mr. Cooney will distribute the copies of my memorandum. Then we shall take a recess.

Mr. Studer.

Mr. Studer: If your Honor please, before you leave, as you know, we represent one of the defendants in this case, the Association of American Soap & Glycerine Producers, Incorporated. We are associated with the Washington firm of Davies, Richberg, Tydings, Beebe & Landa. Mr. Adrien F. Busick of that firm is here and I [fol. 1262] would like to move his admission pro hac vice in this case. He is admitted in all the circuits but one of the country, and the Supreme Court. He is a member of the District of Columbia Bar and the Virginia Bar.

The Court: The motion is granted, sir. We shall be pleased to hear from you, too.

Mr. Stader: Thank you.

The Court: All right. Now don't rush through it—analyze it, digest it. And I would like to hear your comments on my thoughts, too, in the matter. You may agree with me, you may not. But I assure you I will hear you. My mind is not foreclosed on the question.

(Short recess.)

The Court: Mr. Correa.

STATEMENT BY MR. CORREA

Mr. Correa: If your Honor please, we have examined with care your Honor's comments, and I shall try to frame my argument so as to utilize to the maximum extent the very real help which they constitute to our dealing with this question.

Now, if the Court please, let me approach the problem first by reference to this matter of Rule 6(e). It is true that our motion—and I speak, as your Honor knows, for Colgate—is based upon Rule 6(e) of the Rules of Criminal Procedure. It may be, as your Honor suggests, that in view of the wording of Rule 1 and 54 that Rule 6(e) is not [fol. 1262a] available. I don't believe it is a very important question, frankly, because I think to a large extent Rule 6(e) does no more than reflect what was the pre-existing law, in any event, applicable to this question. Further, of course, as your Honor knows, there is, in any event, no lack of power in the Court sitting on the civil side, under Rule 34 and Rule 26—rules relating to subpoenas and to interrogatories—to deal fully with this problem under those powers.

Now, 6(e) is helpful to us, though, because it does furnish in convenient form what I believe is substantially a codification of the pre-existing law. And that rule, as your Honor recalls, says that a juror, an attorney, an interpreter or a stenographer may disclose matters occurring before the grand jury—and I paraphrase—"only when so directed by the Court preliminary to or in connection with a judicial proceeding."

Now, the test or criterion which the courts appear uniformly to have used in determining whether or not disclosure should be made of grand jury minutes in connection with a judicial proceeding is a rather broadly worded one. Indeed, your Honor's own words in this little memorandum correspond—or embody it substantially in the words in which it usually is expressed—where your Honor speaks of the desire of courts to "reach a substantially just result." [fol. 1263] The interests of justice, in short, is the manner in which the courts have stated the criterion by which the determination is made as to whether or not grand jury minutes shall be made available.

And your Honor has in mind that this test, for example, is worded almost precisely that way in United States v. Socony-Vacuum Company as the statement of the Supreme Court on the subject. And also it appears from these various authorities in which this test is set forth, or adverted to, that the test is apparently more readily met, and more easily met, where, as here, the grand jury whose proceedings are under consideration has terminated, has discharged its function and has itself been discharged.

Now, I think that is an important point because your Honor will find in the Socony-Vacuum case, in the Rose case, in Metzler—in any number of the cases on this subject the courts emphasize that—well, the grand jury has finished; it has terminated its function; it has ended its job.

Now, I want to mention briefly—or emphasize briefly—the words "in connection with a judicial proceeding," because they simply make clear again what I believe has always been the law, and that is that the grand jury minutes can be made available in any kind of proceeding where the interests of justice so require. It need not be a case or proceeding which itself flows directly from the grand jury proceeding in question.

Now, a couple of cases have made that quite clear. The Bullock case, which, your Honor will recall, is a fairly recent one—1952, District of Columbia case—and there the grand jury minutes, or part of them, were wanted for the purpose of a proceeding having to do with the status of a police inspector.

Another case is In re Grand Jury Proceedings, Judge Kirkpatrick in the Eastern or Middle District—Eastern District, I think—of Pennsylvania, and there the grand jury transcript was needed in connection with the determination of an application for a beer permit. In point of fact, In re Grand Jury Proceedings goes rather farther than most of the cases with which we have dealt in our briefs and argument because there, as your Honor may have noted, the court permitted access to the grand jury minutes while the grand jury was still continuing in session. And the Court said—and your Honor will note that this case is well before Rule 6(e) or the Rules for Criminal Procedure—and the Court said, referring to the general rule, that where it is in the interests of justice that this should be done it will be done even though the grand jury itself was continuing in session.

Now, that leaves us—or faces us with the problem: What [fol. 1265] are the interests of justice, in general—if one can generalize on the subject—and, in particular, as applied to the situation in our own case, in the case at bar?

Now, as Mr. Justice Douglas pointed out in that Herzog case, there is in all these cases some element of conflict. He called it a conflict between the policy of requiring secrecy of grand jury minutes on the one hand and that policy which, as he put it, seeks to leave no stone unturned in seeking justice in a particular case.

Now, one of the tests which has to do with the policy favoring secrecy, and its applicability in any particular situation, is the five part test, suggested originally in United States v. Amazon Industrial Chemical Corporation, and adopted by the Court of Appeals for this Circuit in United States v. Rose. And I have in mind that your Honor has asked us to address ourselves specifically to that test and its five specific parts. I have it set forth—I think conveniently, if your Honor please—at page 7 of our memorandum, and that might be a convenient place from which to follow it.

Now, I want to say one thing about this statement in this case, if the Court please, because I think it is only after we have studied this case, and the related cases, that it becomes clear that the exception to the rule which is stated in [fol. 1266] the paragraph next succeeding the paragraph in which these five reasons for the rule of secrecy are stated—the exception is an overriding one. In other words, the exception, as I read these cases—that is, the exception being that the rule is not observed when its strict application will defeat the ends of justice—that exception, I take it, would apply even though all—one, or more, or all of the five reasons for the rule were present. I think that is an important point because although we feel—and I think we can demonstrate—that none of these five reasons is here pertinent to the situation in the case at bar, nevertheless, it seems to me that correctly analyzed these cases do not require that showing. I think it is helpful that we are able to make it, but I did not, in making it, wish to be understood as seeming to suggest that, in my view, it was essential under the rule of the Rose case to do that.

Now, turning to these five tests, or the five parts of a test—and they are not really a test, that is perhaps a misnomer—what they are, are reasons favoring secrecy attendant upon grand jury proceedings. And the first one, of course, has no applicability here, that is obvious. The second one equally has no applicability.

Now, the Government makes in its memorandum a very finely spun argument in which they seek to contend that [fol. 1267] the second of these reasons would be applicable to this case. And they do that by emphasizing the first clause there, which reads, “to insure the utmost freedom to the grand jury in its deliberations” and forgetting about the balance of that reason, which reads, “and to prevent persons subject to indictment or their friends from importuning the grand jurors” because when the thing is read in its entirety it is clear that this reason relates to a time when the grand jury is actually in session, and that the main purpose of this is to keep grand jurors from being bothered by prospective defendants, and, as it says, their friends or relatives.

The Court: Off the record.

(Discussion off the record.)

Mr. Correa: But the main part is that these two have to do with a time when the grand jury is actually functioning, when it is in session.

The Court: And considering the matter.

Mr. Correa: And considering the matter, precisely—very importantly.

Third, to prevent subornation of perjury, or tampering with the witnesses who may testify before the grand jury and later appear at the trial of those indicted by it.

Well, there has been no claim or suggestion made that [fol. 1268] that is pertinent here.

Fourth, to encourage free and untrammelled disclosures by persons who have information with respect to the commission of crimes. Let me come back to that one, because there is a very definite claim made that that is pertinent here.

And, five, to protect an innocent accused, who is exonerated, from disclosure of the fact that he has been under investigation, and from the expense of standing trial where there was no probability of guilt.

Well, as to this one, I don't think that is particularly applicable to this case. There is no claim made that it is, although—and I must mention this, in all candor—at page 11 of the Government's brief we find that the Government suggests that this may be involved here—and I emphasize the word "may" because it doesn't seem to me that this is a matter on which they need to argue "may", they must know—and I suspect they know—that it isn't involved. But if you note at the top of page 11 there, the first paragraph ending on that page, where this argument is made, I underlined in my copy the word "may", and it occurs three times in the course of as many sentences in that paragraph.

Now, I don't think that is an argument which warrants being taken seriously because I feel sure that if there were [fol. 1269] anything to the suggestion it would be made in more affirmative terms than that it "may" be involved. And I am not going to spend any time on that point.

Now, I should like, if your Honor please, to go back to four, because that one is seriously suggested by the Government as a point that is involved in the question as to the grand jury minutes here. Now, the short answer to four is that, like the reasons that precede it, four applies only during the pendency of the grand jury proceeding itself. In other words, what four is talking about is the privilege of a witness before the grand jury. And there is no question—and as Wigmore points out—a witness before a grand jury does have a privilege in respect of the testimony which he gives to the grand jury, and that privilege lasts only so long as the pendency of the grand jury proceeding.

Now, that is the point of Section 2362 of Wigmore, which your Honor referred to in your memorandum, and which, I may say, we find referred to by the Supreme Court in the Socony-Vacuum case as being the authority on this question of confidentiality of grand jury minutes, because it is in that connection that the Supreme Court cites and relies on that very section of Wigmore, and that deals, as your Honor knows, with the privilege of a witness. And, as Wigmore points out, it would be undesirable if the witness's privilege [fol. 1270] did last beyond the grand jury session in which he is a witness because that would be a temptation to those so minded to testify falsely in the confidence that their false testimony could never be revealed. That is the point that, your Honor will recall, Wigmore makes concerning this.

So that when we analyze these reasons I think the thing that becomes immediately apparent is that they show why it is that so many courts dealing with this question emphasize that the grand jury is finished, that it has been discharged, that it has performed its function, and that the session is over, that there is nothing pending before the grand jury, that it has done its work. Practically every one of these cases mentions that element as an important element in the consideration of this question.

Now, so much if I may, for the negative side—if I may call it that—of this question, because it is with that that U. S. v. Rose deals in the paragraph we have been considering. And in the next paragraph, where they talk of the ends of justice, U. S. v. Rose—or the court in that case—is considering, or is stating the positive side of the rule.

Now, it is always difficult, I suppose—or appears on the surface difficult to give content, specific content, to such an expression as “where required by the ends of justice.” That sounds to be a most literate generalization and could [fol. 1271] cover, one might suppose, almost anything; but not so in this case, if I may suggest it, because in this case we are dealing with the question of: What is justice, for the purposes of this test, in a federal civil lawsuit? And we don't have to grope around among—like Diogenes with his lantern, looking for an honest man—we don't have to grope around among generalities, we have a set of rules. In short, the Supreme Court, acting pursuant to the direction and authorization of Congress, has laid down the rules, the criteria, for the administration, precisely, of justice in civil litigation.

Now, I may say parenthetically, your Honor, I think sometimes prosecutors—and I must confess that I probably had that view myself in my own day—get the notion that when you talk about justice you must be talking about something on the criminal side of the court because that is where the word “justice” becomes appropriate in relation to judicial proceedings. Of course, we know that is not so. Justice is just as much at issue on the civil side. And the rules are not designed simply to expedite litigation or to ease the administrative burden of the court, they are designed to accomplish the main objective with which all lawyers and all judges in all courts are concerned, and that is the achievement of justice.

The Court: Yes, that is in Rule 1 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

[fol. 1272] Mr. Correa: Precisely, your Honor.

The Court: The first rule.

Mr. Correa: And there is a basic principle to these rules, and that is of the fullest possible disclosure on both sides of the case. I remember, and I am sure your Honor does, when—in fact, with some of my younger associates I sometimes date myself because I still refer to these as “the new rules”, and they were promulgated in '38, and I am reminded that they are not so new any more—but I remember back before '38, in the 30s we had a great deal of stockholder litigation and these plaintiffs would sue in the state court in New York, because they could get a fairly broad examination before trial, and the trick was to file a complaint and sue, and then notice the president or the chairman of the board of a large corporation and get him down to a Special Term and pretty soon the company would settle to avoid that inconvenience and bother. So we all became very great experts on the law of removal because these companies were usually Delaware corporations and plaintiffs were generally from some other state, or from New York State, and if we could remove the case to the Federal Court then you didn't have to worry about examination before trial because in the Federal Court there wasn't any—you simply couldn't get an examination before trial except on a de bene esse basis.

[fol. 1273] Now, I mention that because it underlines the tremendous extent to which these rules lay down a new policy. I mean this isn't just some gradual policy which has crept into the rules by building up over the years, this was a definite decision by the Supreme Court that the old policy was not good and that there should be a new policy which would favor the fullest possible discovery in federal civil litigation. And I don't need to tell your Honor. Anybody who practices in the federal courts knows to what extent that has gone. But whether we approve of it, or disapprove of it, like it or don't like it, the fact is that that is the basis which the Supreme Court in its wisdom has said is the sound basis for the achievement of justice in federal civil litigation.

The Court: And like all good rules it can be abused, plenty.

Mr. Correa: It can be, if your Honor please, there is no question about it.

The Court: And has been, too.

Mr. Correa: And I am afraid it has to be said it has been abused. But the point is very clear that in civil litigation the principle for obtaining justice which the Supreme Court has not only approved, but laid down in the most emphatic terms, is a principle of the fullest possible discovery.

[fol. 1274] Now, let's apply that to this problem, because here we have the ingredient of the problem. The norm is stated as being when it is in the interests of justice. What is deemed by the Supreme Court to be in the interests of justice in civil litigation is equally clearly stated in the Rules of Civil Procedure—the fullest possible discovery. It would seem, if your Honor please, almost without more, that if the rules laid down by the Supreme Court are going to control this lawsuit that we ought to have full discovery of the minutes which we seek.

Now, I think that would probably be true in any event. But whether it would or not, it is true here for a special reason, and that reason is this. Your Honor said earlier—I don't find it in this memorandum, but I think it was in your Honor's remarks before you came to the memorandum—that we, Colgate, had said in substance that the Government had misused the grand jury process.

Well, with great respect, I am afraid we have not made our position entirely clear. We said they have used it. We prescind from the question of whether that is a misuse, or an abuse, or not, it is not material. The point is, they have used the grand jury proceeding, and the process of the grand jury, for the purposes of a civil case. They do that not only in this case but, as we have pointed out in our memorandum, as a matter of policy, in cases generally. [fol. 1275] Now, we are not here to argue that that is an abuse.

The Court: In fact, I heard Judge Barnes say that at a dinner meeting.

Mr. Correa: He said it many times, if your Honor please. And we are not here to argue that that is an abuse of process. If we were, we would be moving to suppress. And we are doing just the opposite. We are accepting that. But we are saying that if they want to use the grand jury as an adjunct to the preparation of civil cases, as a means of obtaining a pretrial discovery—because that is what it is, it is pretrial; pre-complaint, too; but discovery nonetheless—then they must be content to have it treated as any kind of pretrial discovery is treated under the Rules of Civil Procedure.

In other words, what we are saying to your Honor is we may be required—when I say “we” I mean the courts as well as litigants, like ourselves—we may be required, because of the practicalities of the matter, to concede that the Department of Justice has to use the grand jury to prepare civil cases—I say “we may be”—but if we must make that concession then let the rules and the policy governing the conduct of civil cases apply as well to the grand jury proceedings.

Now, that is not without reservation. It is subject, of [fol. 1276] course, to reservations that may be appropriate in other kinds of cases. But in this case—this case, as your Honor will recall—because your Honor made a—perhaps “finding” is a more formal word than is warranted, but a statement concerning it in an opinion which your Honor wrote some time ago on a motion, I believe, of Procter & Gamble—but, as your Honor will recall, from the inception of this grand jury investigation the Department had it in mind that its event might be a civil proceeding—purely civil case. When they did file a civil complaint, in December of 1952, as we pointed out in our brief, they filed it with the statement—or press release, in point of fact—in which they said, “The filing of the complaint”—I am quoting the press release—“results from a careful and thorough investigation of the industry, including extensive grand jury proceedings.”

Now, we have pointed out in our memorandum how just by referring to the ordinary procedures set up internally within the Department for the drafting, and the clearing and approval of complaints, and referring, as well, to the dates when, for example, Mr. Little, the then president of the Colgate-Palmolive Company testified, and the date when the grand jury was discharged, which was a few days later, and the date when the complaint was filed, which was two weeks, including, as your Honor pointed out, a [fol. 1277] Thanksgiving week-end holiday—simply by regarding those things it is perfectly patent on the face of the record that when at least certain of these witnesses testified—and I may be pardoned, having a certain interest in Mr. Little testifying, because he was president of my client, and is now chairman of the board—it is perfectly patent that when, for example, Mr. Little testified the Department had this civil complaint in course of preparation and, I would suggest, pretty well completed, going through the mill for approval, as seems quite clear, under their procedure, that is where it must have been. So that they knew that.

Now, I am not here to contend that it was a heinous thing, that they served a grand jury subpoena on Mr. Little when they knew that a civil complaint was what was going to come out of the investigation, when they had, so to speak, a civil complaint in their back pocket, unbeknownst to us, of course; all I am saying is that if they are to have that kind of discovery—because that is what it is, it is sworn discovery, used in the process of the court—if they are to have that kind of discovery in a civil case, then their discovery should be subject to the same ground rules that apply to everybody else. The courts of this country increasingly are saying that to the Department of Justice in all kinds of cases, and especially [fol. 1278] in antitrust cases. And they are saying to the Department, “When you come into court as a civil plaintiff you have got to play the game according to the rules of the game as they are laid down for all litigants.” That was the special pertinence of that Cotton Valley Operators case, which we cited to your Honor, which involved F.B.I. reports. And the Department didn’t want to produce the F.B.I. reports, in fact, said they wouldn’t produce them. And, of course, the court, on its separation of powers, did not deem that it had the duty—I mean that it had the power to compel the Department to produce the reports. “But,” said the Court, “we don’t have to give relief to any litigant, including the United States, who comes and defies our orders” and dismissed the complaint. That was affirmed by an equally divided Supreme Court, a four to four decision.

And there have been others. This Bowman case—which is not the same situation in the Supreme Court, at least—is another illustration of the trend of decisions in the courts of this country, including the Supreme Court itself, toward requiring the Government in civil litigation to abide by the ordinary principles and the ordinary rules which apply to any other litigant.

Now, those principles favor above all, as your Honor knows, discovery. They favor, as well, the elimination of surprise. They do not favor any device by which—[fol. 1279] because the Department has to use the grand jury proceeding, which happens to be an established form of proceeding on the criminal side of the court—they are able to come out, having obtained, in effect, a most extensive pretrial discovery, conducted wholly ex parte, and without having to disclose the product of that proceeding—even the product of it—to their adversary. It is as if there was some procedure by which we could go and take depositions ex parte, and tell the Government, “Well, we have got them, and you haven’t, and that’s it. If we are going to use them, you will find out at the trial. That is a little element of surprise we have." And the rules were designed precisely, and in terms, to eliminate elements of surprise, including, we submit, any element which may be gained by the procedure followed here.

Now, if the Court please, the nature of the proceeding, in the sense of this grand jury proceeding—in the sense that it had always in view—the Department had always in view the possibility of a civil complaint coming out of it—in other words, they were working toward a civil complaint at all stages—is important when it is contrasted with another type of case, where a purely criminal investigation is conducted before the grand jury, and thereafter, after the grand jury is all finished, and has indicted or returned a "no bill", as the case may be, there is a [fol. 1280] civil case in which the Government finds it is incidentally the beneficiary of some information or evidence that has been gathered in the prior criminal investigation. That appears to have been the situation in the General Motors case which Judge Leahy decided.

Now, I think the General Motors case is wrong, in the sense that I think—and I rather gather that your Honor does, too—that Judge Leahy did not consider or, perhaps, did not have called to his attention all of the appropriate authorities. And I think, as we have pointed out in our memorandum, his opinion seems to rely very heavily on criminal cases involving efforts by defendants to open the grand jury minutes so that they can attack the indictment. And, of course, as your Honor has pointed out, those cases are simply not in point. There are reasons of policy there which have nothing whatever to do with our situation here.

Now, if the Court please, the Government's position here seems to be that these grand jury minutes are in some way privileged. I say "in some way privileged" because I believe I discern in their arguments at least two separate grounds of privilege—or maybe they are not separate, I don't know—but anyway, the contention of privilege is advanced. Now, they make one contention which is the [fol. 1281] work product privilege, as near as I can judge it from their brief. And about that I think only a word needs to be said.

You don't get any work product privilege where you are using the processes and procedures of the court. Work product privilege may apply, to be sure, if I go out, at great inconvenience and difficulty, to interview a witness, and make my notes of what he has to say, and what he will say, and my impression about him, and then bring it back to my office, and my opponent can't sit in his office and say, "Well, that's fine. I am glad you did that. Now I will just subpoena that and that will save me having to go see that fellow." That's work product, sure. But where the processes of the court are invoked, as here, then I think work product is simply not pertinent, it is not relevant. It's as if I were to say, "Well, I am taking a deposition, but I don't want the Government in attendance at the deposition, because, after all, the questions and the line I take with the witness will reflect a great deal of work on my part, and that is my work product, and they shouldn't be there. They can't have that." Having invoked the processes of the court for pretrial discovery, the principles of the rules take hold and my pretrial discovery has to be out in the open, so far as my opponent is concerned. And that is all we are suggesting ought to be binding on the Government here.

[fol. 1282] Now, the other privilege they seem to suggest is one that I must confess rather astonished me. The Government said, if I read their papers correctly, "Well, we hired the grand jury stenographer, and paid the grand jury stenographer out of our appropriation, and we have got the physical transcripts, the Court hasn't got them, and they, therefore, come under rules laid down by the Attorney General, applicable to records of the Department of Justice. And they are privileged under those rules and their disclosure cannot be compelled."

Now, it is just inconceivable to me—perhaps because I have listened too many times to courts charging grand juries and telling the grand jury that they were arms of the court, and have heard too often that reference made to believe that the grand jury is an arm of the court sort of tied behind its back by the Department of Justice. I just don't believe that is the law. I don't think that their cases have any applicability. Rule 6(e) would be meaningless, if there were anything to that suggestion, because Rule 6(e) seems to put the matter in the control of the Court, the matter of disclosure of the minutes, and so do all these cases, including the criminal cases, in which courts have dealt with questions as to whether or not grand jury minutes should be disclosed. I know of not a single case in which the Court has indicated that any [fol. 1283] decision the Court may reach on that question is subject to some rule of the Department of Justice or of the Attorney General. I think that that argument simply has no support in the instant case, in authority, or, for that matter, in logic, with great respect to my learned friends.

The only other thing which the Government's memorandum does discuss is the cases. And your Honor's memorandum has pretty well disposed—certainly of the cases they principally rely on. They discuss the General Motors case. Your Honor, of course, has in mind that that antedated U. S. vs. Rose. I suspect had it come out after that the result would have been different.

Now, there is this dictum or statement of Judge Medina's. Well, I think your Honor has evaluated that for what it is worth. As it happens, I represented two of the defendants in that case before Judge Medina, including one so-called major one. And we weren't interested enough to try to get Judge Medina to hear argument on that motion with respect to the grand jury minutes. And I have no doubt whatever that he would at least have heard argument had all of us, or very many of us, or any of us pressed very seriously for it. But even Mr. Carson, who is quoted in the transcript which is set forth in the papers before your Honor, even he wasn't pressing very vigorously on [fol. 1284] that point. So that I don't think it can be taken as a decision which was very fully considered, or carefully considered, or even given very much thought.

Now, as to this Darling case in Minnesota, that is left in kind of an unsatisfactory way because apparently what the Government's brief reflects is an informal conference with the judge who presided there in chambers. Furthermore, it is difficult to see how much in point that case is since the application there was made by witnesses who had been before the grand jury, apparently not parties to the litigation. And I am not at all sure that the same considerations would apply to that question.

However, one of co-counsel has handed me a letter which they have received from one of the attorneys in the Darling case, which may add something to our meager store of information concerning that authority. And perhaps I might read that to your Honor.

Mr. Royall: The judge said he was going to disregard it.

Mr. Correa: It has been pointed out to me, if your Honor please, that your Honor said you would disregard the Darling case.

The Court: Well, it is not reported, is it?

Mr. Correa: It is not reported, and never will be. As I understand it, it has been dismissed, and there never will [fol. 1285] be any report of it. So that we have got some further information about it, but I don't know that that is any better in quality.

The Court: Unless somebody can show me why I should consider it and why it may be pertinent in deciding this motion. I have always been afraid of these unpublished decisions.

Mr. Correa: Well, as I understand it, Judge, this wasn't even a decision; it was simply a judge saying to a group of lawyers what he thought he was going to do about a motion pending before him. But then he never got to do it, because he was never called upon to do it. Now, that is the status of it. And I don't think that is a very high grade of authority. And I think perhaps it is best left out of consideration, because, as I say, there never will be any decision in the case, if we are correctly informed about its status.

Now, if the Court please, I have tried to answer in the course of my remarks all the questions which your Honor has put. But there is one question which occurs to me that may perhaps be dealt with specifically. And I refer to page 3, question 2, on that page where your Honor says, and I quote, "I would like all of defendants' counsel to tell me exactly how production of the grand jury transcripts would materially aid their trial preparation." [fol. 1286] Now, if the Court please, the answer to that is apparent, once we appreciate what this grand jury proceeding consisted of. This grand jury proceeding, as the materials we have referred to show, was a pretrial, precomplaint discovery into the very questions, the very issues, which are posed by the pleadings herein, by the complaint.

The Court: Mr. Correa, if you consider that the grand jury was in the nature of pretrial discovery—

Mr. Correa: Which it was.

The Court: —by the plaintiff now—you don't have to answer that question.

Mr. Correa: I am not sure I got that. I am afraid I missed a word somewhere.

The Court: Well, I didn't know you were going to contend that the grand jury proceedings, looking toward an indictment, were going to be considered in the nature of a pretrial discovery proceeding by the plaintiff in this case.

Mr. Correa: But your Honor has said three very significant words in the statement you just made—"looking toward an indictment." That's a grand jury proceeding, and not a discovery proceeding, except in the generic sense, on the criminal side, but where you have a grand jury proceeding which is looking toward a civil complaint, as this one was, from its inception—to be sure, at the beginning, it will be contended—and we can't disprove it—that it was [fol. 1287] looking also toward an indictment. But the point is not that it was looking exclusively toward a civil complaint, it was looking toward a civil complaint, and it was that from the beginning. And I say that any proceeding which consists—

The Court: Could you establish that fact, do you think, that they never intended to get an indictment?

Mr. Correa: No, I don't have to establish that, if your Honor please. As I understand the law, all I have to establish is that whatever they intended, or didn't intend, about an indictment, from the very beginning they did intend the possibility of a civil suit, a civil complaint, based on the very evidence that they were getting from the witnesses before the grand jury. And that is exactly what happened.

So there are two points that are important. No. 1, at the beginning that is what they intended, not as a sole or exclusive intention, to be sure, but they intended it; and, No. 2, that is what came out at the other end of the proceeding.

Now, I say that if that isn't pretrial discovery, what is it? They discovered evidence. They used the evidence to base a civil complaint. That evidence has conditioned all their thinking, all their preparation that they are engaged in currently. And the Rules of Civil Procedure say that we should [fol. 1288] be in the same position as our opponent with respect to any evidence which is a matter of record and obtained as such under the process and procedures of the court; and we are not.

Now, I don't mind—if your Honor please, let me emphasize that point again; this is the final point I make—I say again I don't mind their having this anomalous situation where they use the criminal process of the court, and the criminal procedures, the grand jury, in the aid of a civil case. We have crossed that. We are not challenging that. But I do say that they should not have, and the law does not contemplate that they should have, and it is contrary to the interests of justice—or in the words of the Rose case, it would defeat the ends of justice to permit them as a result of that anomalous situation to gain the very—

The Court: Unfair advantage over the defendants.

Mr. Correa: —the very kind of unfair advantage which the Supreme Court sought in 1938 to eliminate forever from federal civil litigation; yes, your Honor.

The Court: I knew you were going to say that sooner or later.

The Court: Mr. Busick.

STATEMENT BY MR. BUSICK

Mr. Busick: Your Honor, all I ask is for a short time to emphasize a few points and to respond to the memorandum which your Honor gave us this morning.

[fol. 1289] As a preliminary matter, it seems to me that to say that the general rule is that evidence before a grand jury is not to be disclosed is not an exact statement in view of what the Supreme Court said in the Socony-Vacuum case. This is quoted.

“After the grand jury's functions are ended disclosure is wholly proper when the ends of justice require it.”

Therefore, it seems to me the general rule is that where the ends of justice require it, it will always be disclosed.

Now, in the subsequent case in the Supreme Court, the Bowman case—now, that was a criminal case under the Sherman law, it is true, but the court sustained a subpoena duces tecum which required the production of exhibits before the grand jury. And in connection with that the Court said this:

"There is no intention to exclude from the reach of process of the defendant any material that had been used before the grand jury."

Now, counsel for the Government seeks to distinguish between exhibits and testimony. It seems to me there is no proper legal distinction. They are simply two classes of testimony adduced before the grand jury. He says that to reveal oral testimony might embarrass a witness. Well, it is [fol. 1290] just as true that a document produced by the witness could be just as embarrassing. So if you give access to the documents, by the same reasoning you give access to the oral testimony. It doesn't seem to me, your Honor, that there is any distinction there.

Now, this case would seem to be one where the principles, the policy of the Rules of Criminal Procedure might be applied, for this reason, your Honor. This is a case civil in form, it is true, but in fact it is a quasi-criminal matter. These defendants are charged with violating Section 1 and Section 2 of the Sherman law.

Now, a violation of those sections is a criminal offense. It is true the statute provides two methods of enforcing a law, one criminal and the other civil. But the substantive law is a criminal statute.

Now, for that reason it seems to me that the policy of the Rules of Criminal Procedure might be considered, your Honor, in determining whether or not we should have access to the testimony of witnesses before the grand jury.

Now, furthermore, your Honor, it seems to me, so far as counsel for the Association is concerned, that this motion doesn't have to be brought under any particular paragraph of the civil rules, or the criminal rules. The purpose of most of those rules is to permit one party to acquire through [fol. 1291] order of the court information in the hands of the other party.

We make this motion to your Honor to allow access to records in your jurisdiction, under your control. We are not asking you to make the Department of Justice do something. It may be that if your Honor thinks we should have that testimony you will order the Department to produce it. But, nevertheless, that testimony is a part of the record in that proceeding and we are entitled to have it.

Now, I am not certain—your Honor, in his memorandum, refers to the contention of the Government that this testimony really is confidential documents of the Department and therefore they cannot be disclosed, under the decisions. Now, its principal reliance, I assume, from his brief, is on this statute:

“... the attendance before the grand jury during the taking of testimony of one or more clerks or stenographers employed in a clerical capacity to assist the district attorney or other counsel for the Government who shall, in that connection, be deemed to be persons acting for and on behalf of the United States in an official capacity and function.”

Now, what that statute does, and the only thing it does, is to make it lawful for a stenographer to be in the room. [fol. 1292] There is nothing in the world in that statute, to my mind, your Honor, that can be construed as saying that the transcript of the testimony is not under the control of this Court for all time. It can't be a confidential document in the possession of the Department of Justice. For centuries the records of the grand jury have been a part of the records of the court to which the grand jury was attached. I doubt very seriously whether Congress, if it wanted to, could transfer the records of the grand jury generally to the Department of Justice and put them under their control.

All the functions of the Federal Government under the Constitution are enjoyed by the three coordinate branches. For hundreds of years the grand jury and its proceedings have been a part of the judiciary and the judicial branch of the Government. They are part of the judicial branch of the Government today. And I don't think it would be constitutional for Congress to transfer them to the executive branch of the Government. They have no place there.

Now, your Honor, coming to your memorandum, you say, “I would like all of defendants' counsel to tell me exactly how production of the grand jury transcripts would materially aid their trial preparation.”

Well, now, if your Honor please, I think that the Association [fol. 1293] is more in the dark as to what they are charged with in this case than any one of the defendants. This is a printed copy of the complaint. In that complaint under paragraph 34 there are 13 paragraphs and under paragraph 34(b) there are 11 paragraphs distinctly alleging that the three corporations have done certain things. Now, it is followed by this allegation, "The defendant Association has assisted the other defendants in doing the things described in subparagraphs 34(a) and 34(b)." That is all the information we got of what we did.

The Court: Well, you are certainly entitled to know how you assisted, I grant you that.

Mr. Busick: I beg your pardon.

The Court: You are entitled to know how they claim you assisted.

Mr. Busick: What I was coming to is this, your Honor. Of course, we will exhaust our remedies under the Rules of Civil Procedure. But there is nothing that will give us the picture of this case like being able to read the transcript of the testimony before that grand jury.

Not only that, your Honor says the Government designates what it is going to use. Well, that means we can work up a defense for that. But how about testimony of what is favorable to us. He isn't going to give us that, because he isn't going to use it.

[fol. 1294] The Court: I don't know how fair the Government is going to be about it. They might give it to you.

Mr. Busick: Your Honor said to give them what they are going to use. So that I say that nothing will give us, the Association, the picture of the case against us. Now, the Government at this minute probably knows every particle of evidence they are going to introduce on the whole theory of connecting us with an alleged conspiracy and we know nothing of it.

Now, we can get, at best, fuller—have a better understanding of it from the minutes of that grand jury proceeding, from the testimony, than any other way.

And in conclusion, I think your Honor has a perfect, complete power under the two decisions which I have cited to say to us that we can see that transcript. And you would be doing what the Supreme Court said is perfectly proper to do.

Thank you.

The Court: Well, suppose they told you who testified in the grand jury that you assisted, couldn't you take their deposition?

Mr. Busick: I assume we could take their depositions, if we knew who they were. Personally, the Association doesn't know who the witnesses were.

The Court: It does not?

[fol. 1295] Mr. Busick: No, sir; we have no information on it. I know a few of them because it called for some persons from the Association. They got our documents, they returned them, and they will designate the ones they are going to use. But that will just give us an idea of what they are going to do. But what are they going to prove against us, and how are they going to prove it? I think, your Honor, we are entitled to know from that general allegation just how we are supposed to have assisted in any alleged conspiracy. Thank you.

The Court: Gentlemen, it is ten minutes of one. I generally adjourn for lunch at a quarter of one. It will be difficult enough to get back here at 2 if we adjourn now. Try to get back at 2; please.

(Noon Recess.)

[fol. 1296]

AFTERNOON SESSION

The Court: Mr. Fortas.

STATEMENT BY MR. FORTAS

Mr. Fortas: May it please the Court: Your Honor, in common with other counsel, I have a sense of great responsibility in discussing the question that is before you. I realize, as your Honor has recognized in the statement that he made this morning, that this is a question of great importance.

We are asking your Honor to make a ruling in this case, to grant our motions in this case to give us access to the transcript of the testimony of witnesses before the grand jury. In making that motion we are asking your Honor to make a ruling that is without precise precedent.

In other phases of this case your Honor has demonstrated that he is willing to deal with the problems of this Big Case and to deal with them on their merits and squarely in the interests of justice and in the interests of an efficient and effective trial of a Big Case. I speak for myself, and I believe that I reflect the views of counsel who represent the other defendants, in any event, when I say that to date the results of that approach by your Honor have been excellent and I believe that we are on our way to establishing some useful procedure in connection with these vexatious Big Cases.

[fol. 1297] Now, we have before us today a problem that in terms of magnitude and in terms of its importance to the administration of the Big Case is at least as important as the documentary problems with which this Court has heretofore been concerned, and as to which this Court has heretofore devised—invented, I may say—procedures which are novel, which are sound, and which I believe will be discussed for many years to come.

I have said that these motions that are before your Honor now present a new question. And they do. The nearest thing is the decision of Judge Carter in the Standard Oil case in California—I withdraw that; perhaps I shouldn't say "decision"—the opinion that Judge Carter expressed at the pretrial conference when he allowed access to the testimony of those witnesses before the grand jury who consented. Apart from that all of the other cases on the books are different in one respect or another. And I shall not delay to talk about those differences.

So that I repeat, we are presenting to your Honor, substantially speaking, a new question and are respectfully asking your Honor to bring to bear upon this new question, so tremendously important in the administration of justice, so tremendously important in the handling of Big Cases—we are asking your Honor to bring to bear upon that the same qualities that have led to the prior administrative [fol. 1298] decisions in this case.

It is in that spirit, your Honor, that we have attempted to brief this case, in the spirit of trying to be of the greatest possible assistance to the Court.

The problem that is before your Honor is one that is simple of statement, even if difficult of resolution. On the one hand there is a tradition, a tradition that grand jury proceedings are secret.

I state it in that broad fashion because it is the statement of a virtue, of a value, of an abstract principle, if you please. But it is a principle that has to be examined very closely and very carefully for the purpose of arriving at a decision in any particular situation.

The grand jury proceedings have been protected in order to preserve and protect the objective of grand juries. The usual objective of a grand jury is to consider whether there is probable cause in an allegedly criminal situation and to consider whether it will indict or will not indict.

Your Honor's experience is such that I am sure he fully realizes that that is the context in which this abstract generalization about the secrecy of grand juries has arisen. Even in that narrow context of the ordinary, run of the mill criminal proceedings where the question is to indict or not to indict, even in that narrow context there are many situations in which the grand jury proceedings are not secret. There is, for example, the case in which by [fol. 1299] evidence outside of the grand jury proceeding the defense charges that there was no probable cause, or that there was something improper before the grand jury. There is the case in which a witness before a grand jury is charged with having perjured himself before the grand jury. That is the United States against Rose case in this circuit and the Remington case in the Second Circuit. There are a good many decisions in which grand jury transcripts, even in these limited proceedings, the ordinary, run of the mill criminal proceedings, have been opened up for purposes of libel proceedings, and so on, every case, every situation, being looked at under a microscope, as is the custom in our system of justice.

So that even in the narrow context in which this general principle leads up to say, "Yes, grand jury proceedings are secret"—even in the narrow context in which that expression has arisen, and to which it is applicable, there are many exceptions where the ends of justice require it.

Now we come to the situation of the Big Case. We come to the situation of a civil antitrust proceeding which followed an investigation before a grand jury. The investigation having been completed, the grand jury having been discharged without returning an indictment—the grand jury, in other words, being functus officio, its [fol. 1300] function being ended, having long been ended—its function in this narrow sense of whether to retain an indictment or not possibly never having existed, but even if it did exist, even if that was actually a question here, even if the grand jury was not used solely for purposes of a civil investigation, even in those circumstances it is notable that the present situation also involves the element that no indictment was returned. So I suggest to your Honor that we are far outside—far outside of the context in which the general principle that grand jury proceedings are secret was born and in the context of which that general principle is usually repeated.

Now, what do we have here, what precisely are the values, with which we are here concerned, what are the factors on the one side and on the other side, what is the precise situation?

Your Honor, let me start—I hope I may start—with this proposition, to recapitulate. Grand jury proceedings are secret. But what proceedings; in what respects; upon what occasions; what parts of the grand jury proceedings?

Now, those, I think, are the key questions and I think that what I am about to say will develop them. Let me first start with clearing away one very simple proposition. We are not here concerned with the grand jury proceedings [fol. 1301] as a whole. We are not asking for access to grand jury proceedings as a whole. We are here speaking only of the transcript of the testimony of witnesses who were called before the grand jury. That is all we are concerned with here. All of the cases, all of the learning, all of the lore with respect to the secrecy of grand jury deliberations, of the way the grand jurors voted, of what was said by them, or among them, all of that lore is beside the point. Our motions are addressed solely to the testimony of witnesses who appeared and testified before the grand jury.

Now, as to the testimony of those witnesses, is that testimony secret, is that testimony part of what the law has in mind, so to speak, when it says that grand jury proceedings are secret? The answer to that, your Honor, if I may respectfully say so, is clearly and unequivocally no, as a general rule, subject to very limited exceptions.

Now, Rule 6(a) of the Criminal Rules of Procedure, as Mr. Correa indicated, is to a large extent merely a codification of the existing law at the time. But Rule 6(a) makes it clear beyond any dispute that a witness before a grand jury cannot be sworn to secrecy. Rule 6(a) says that no persons other than those specifically enumerated—the jurors, the attorneys, the clerks, and so on—no person other than those may be sworn to secrecy. Witnesses who [fol. 1302] appear before a grand jury are free, if they choose, to go outside and to tell what they said to the grand jury. Of that there is no doubt.

So I respectfully submit to your Honor that this general statement—which we all cherish, properly understood—that grand jury proceedings are secret, clearly does not apply to the witness. The witness cannot be sworn to secrecy. The witness may disclose what he said. The only aspect of secrecy that attaches to a witness's testimony seems to me this, that with some exceptions the witness cannot be compelled to testify as to what he said before the grand jury while the grand jury is still in session. After the grand jury is discharged the witness may, in appropriate circumstances, be compelled to testify.

But I want to make it very clear, your Honor, that there is this fundamental distinction that is drawn in the cases, and in Rule 6(e), between the grand jurors themselves, their attorneys and assistants, on the one hand, and the testimony of witnesses. We are not here dealing with an aspect of what goes on before the grand jury—that is, within the limits, or within the borders, within the scope of that general principle of law that, I repeat, we all believe in, that grand jury proceedings are secret.

With that background let's see just what we have here. We are talking only about what the witnesses testified to [fol. 1303] before the grand jury. Is it the Government's position that that testimony is secret, that that testimony cannot be disclosed? Is that the value that they are trying to protect here?

Well, in the first place, that isn't true. As I have just stated, Rule 6(e) leaves the witnesses entirely free to say what they said before the grand jury. There is no cloak of secrecy with respect to the witnesses' testimony. What is the value then that the Government is trying to protect here; what is it?

The testimony of witnesses is all that we seek. They say that it is secret. They say that the testimony of witnesses has to be protected from disclosure.

But is that really what they are saying? We all know that it is not what they are saying, for this reason. In the first place, they have used that testimony themselves as part of their preparation of the case. That is clear from the statement of issues and from common knowledge.

In the second place, they will use the testimony of those witnesses in public, your Honor, on a public record, your Honor, in the trial of this case. And Mr. McDowell, in response to your Honor's question No. 1, is not going to tell you that the Government will not use portions of the testimony of these witnesses. They are going to use [fol. 1304] it for the purpose of impeaching witnesses; they are going to use it primarily for what is whimsically called by us lawyers "refreshing the witness's recollection."

If your Honor please, if the testimony of witnesses is going to be used by the Government in the trial of this case, can the Government, if it thinks about this, and if it presents its case with customary candor—can the Government say to your Honor, "We consider the testimony of witnesses before a grand jury to be secret and sacrosanct so that it must not be disclosed to anybody?"

To me that just doesn't add up. That is to say, it seems to me that the Government has a choice. The Government can take the position that the testimony of witnesses before the grand jury in a case of this sort is secret. In that event they would not use that testimony as part of the preparation of their case, except possibly to the extent that it stuck in their minds; certainly they would not use that testimony at the trial of the case for purposes of refreshing the witnesses' recollection or for purposes of impeachment.

I am afraid, your Honor, that, upon analysis, what has happened here is that inadvertently a general principle, that grand jury proceedings are secret, has become distorted by the Government to its use as an instrument of Government trial tactics.

[fol. 1305] Now, I realize the seriousness of that statement. I am not saying that it is deliberate. I say that it is something that has kind of grown up without anybody really thinking it through. And perhaps this is the first occasion on which this question has been fully briefed before a court.

Just to recapitulate it—and then I have another word or two to say about it—what is going to happen here; and what has happened here? Witnesses appeared before a grand jury in the investigation of these defendants. The Department of Justice, Mr. McDowell tells us in his brief, hired a stenographer, and that stenographer, pursuant to statute, went into the grand jury room and took a transcript of the testimony of those witnesses. Now, what happened next? What happened next, according to the illuminating advices that I find in Mr. McDowell's brief, is that the transcript of that testimony was taken from this district, this courthouse, down to Washington, where it is in the Department of Justice, in the Antitrust Division.

That transcript was then used by the many lawyers who have worked on this case in the Department of Justice as part of their investigatory process, part of their discovery process for purposes of this case. That transcript is also in reserve, in their hip pockets, if your Honor, please, for use at the trial. At the trial a witness will take [fol. 1306] the stand and the Department of Justice lawyers will then use that transcript to what we lawyers call—again I say we whimsically call—"refreshing the witnesses' recollection".

These witnesses appeared before the grand jury in 1952—or at least most of them did. The trial certainly will not take place until 1956. As to Lever Brothers Company the only witnesses that we know who were ever connected with Lever Brothers Company who testified before that grand jury were four in number—Mr. Luckman, Mr. Brownell, Mr. Elder and Mr. Walsh.

At the time they testified before the grand jury, your Honor, no one of those four men was connected with Lever Brothers Company, not one of them. Mr. Luckman had been president of the company. He had left the company in a situation that gave rise to a great deal of discussion in the press. Mr. Brownell had left the company before Mr. Luckman did. And I think the same is true of Mr. Walsh and Mr. Elder.

Now, the Government has used the transcript of those men for purposes of the preparation of their case, for purposes as part of their discovery. At the trial they will undoubtedly call one or more of them as witnesses, probably all of them. And at the trial these men will be confronted with portions of their testimony before the grand jury. And I, as counsel for Lever Brothers Company, [fol. 1307] will be confronted with that same material, without notice, without "by your leave" and without any prior disclosure.

Now, your Honor, let me go a little out of order here and point out that even if we could take the deposition of those men now, it would be practically useless. Mr. Luckman, in all these intervening years, has been a highly successful, very busy architect out on the West Coast. Mr. Brownell is now with a company engaged in the distilled whiskey business. Mr. Walsh has a little store up in Massachusetts. Mr. Elder is a management consultant, a very busy man. Even if we could take their deposition now, so many years removed from the event, it would probably do us very little good.

Now, let us take a look at this, if your Honor please, from the point of view, not of fairness to us—although that is a basic consideration—but, if you please, from the point of view of the administration of the Big Case, and let's see what the position is. I have tried to say to your Honor that the question here is not whether the testimony of witnesses before the grand jury shall be disclosed—because the Government has used it, they have got it down in Washington, apparently, and they all go over it, they are going to use it at the trial—but the question is: Should the Government have exclusive access to this testimony as one of the weapons in its arsenal for purposes of the [fol. 1308] Big Case?

Now, the unfairness of that is so patent that I shan't dwell on it. But what I want to comment on right here is what it means in terms of the administration of the Big Case. You see, your Honor, I regard this question that we are presenting to you on this motion as a very narrow question, in terms of the circumstances. It is the kind of a question that is apt to arise only in the Big Case, because it is only there that you have a grand jury—with some few exceptions—it is only there that you have a grand jury that is used for investigatory purposes, and that does not indict, and then you have a civil proceeding following it in which the grand jury material is used for discovery. They are very rare cases, but they are very big ones, and they take a lot of time of the Court every time one of them comes up. So I say that it is quite appropriate to think about this in terms of the administration of the Big Case.

Now, what are going to be the consequences if we don't get access to the testimony of these witnesses? No. 1, we are not going to be prepared as we should be.

Now, your Honor, I don't make that point lightly and I don't make it because it is easy to say. It is the fact. Let me illustrate it.

Under your Honor's guidance the Government furnished [fol. 1309] us with statements of issues. In one of these statements of issues—I don't have my files here on this and couldn't check this exactly—in connection with one or more of the statements of issues the Government said that it intended to—in effect, that it intended to rely upon various conversations, telephone and personal conversations. Now, this is, therefore, not going to be a documentary case, as a good many of the Big Cases are. We endeavored—by search through our documents, the people available to us, in every way that we could—to find the source, to find some clue as to those alleged conversations. I don't assume that the Government invented them. I assume that they are based upon material in the grand jury transcript.

And I say to you, your Honor, that we must have that; we are entitled to have that; your Honor is entitled to have us have that, because your Honor is entitled to have us thoroughly prepared for trial, and not every day of trial to say, "This is a surprise and we need a recess." Now, that is point 1.

Point 2, the use by the Government of the transcript of the witnesses' testimony itself. In the Socony-Vacuum case, the opinion of Mr. Justice Douglas—that was a criminal indictment, antitrust indictment—Mr. Justice Douglas' opinion states that there were 90 times when the grand jury testimony was used to "refresh the recollection of witnesses." After a while, it appears from his opinion, the controversy among counsel as to the use of that transcript became such that the judge took over and the judge would examine the transcript of the testimony of the witnesses before the grand jury and the judge would then ask the witnesses about any possible refreshment of recollection that they could derive from their grand jury testimony.

If your Honor please, it seems to me that that is no way to run a Big Case. It seems to me that the right was to run a Big Case, and the way contemplated by the Rules of Civil Procedure, is for all of the parties to the Big Case to be equally informed.

When I say that we want to be equally informed with the Government, I want to emphasize that I am not asking for any material which is secret in the sense that we think of when we say grand jury proceedings are secret. There are certain safeguards around grand jury proceedings, and I would be the last one to want to invade them. But here the Government has made its choice, it has made its choice to bring the civil proceeding, it has made its choice to use the transcript of the grand jury proceedings, and it will, without any doubt, make its choice to use the transcript of witnesses' testimony at the time of trial. So that the real question here is whether the Government should be allowed [fol. 1311] to have that instrument of surprise, that instrument to attack the uninformed, in total contravention of the spirit and letter of the Rules of Civil Procedure.

Now, your Honor, the Government has used a quotation with which we are all familiar, and which appears in a number of cases, which says that the right to discover must yield to a loftier value. And I agree with that statement. But the Government takes the position that an equally lofty purpose to the so-called protection of the grand jury proceedings, or of the testimony of the witnesses, is to establish the truth, to find out the facts, to refresh the recollection of a witness, and that when this alleged secrecy of the testimony of witnesses before a grand jury comes in conflict with the other value of establishing the truth through the examination of a witness, through the use of that grand jury transcript for purposes of discovery, for purposes of refreshing the recollection of the witness, then they say it is appropriate to use the testimony of witnesses before the grand jury.

Now, I agree. What it comes down to is this, that the discovery of the truth, the discovery of the facts in a case of this sort is a sufficiently valid and lofty purpose, if you will, to justify the use of the transcript of witnesses' testimony before the grand jury. That must be the position that the [fol. 1312] Government is taking. And I say that's right. And therefore we should have access to it, as well. We should also be able to use it to find out the facts and to establish the truth in this Big Case that is before your Honor.

If your Honor please, all the points that I am making I make without reference to the nature of the Government's proceeding before the grand jury here. It is perfectly clear that the Government presented this matter before the grand jury initially for purposes of an investigation of these defendants to end up in civil or criminal proceedings. That is what they have admitted in their affidavit of March 21, 1953, and your Honor so found in an opinion entered in this case at an earlier time. I think it was May 11, 1953. Reference to it is in the Colgate brief at page 12. They started this proceeding for the purpose of ending up, with the thought of ending up, with the avowed purpose of ending up in a criminal or civil proceedings.

I hope I may be forgiven, your Honor, if I suggest that I find it impossible to believe that they seriously contemplated ending up in criminal proceedings. I don't believe that they did and the record here certainly shows—as your Honor's statement this morning and as Mr. Correa's statement indicate—that they used the proceedings before the grand jury for civil discovery. The indications are that they [fol. 1313] prepared their complaint, their civil complaint, before the grand jury was discharged.

But in any event, I am willing to assume that they went before the grand jury for an investigation thinking that perhaps they might get a criminal indictment. And I say that that makes no difference whatever, that the real point at issue here is the use of the testimony of witnesses before the grand jury, the use of that testimony for discovery by the Government, the use of that testimony for purposes of impeachment of witnesses, and to refresh the witnesses' recollection, and the possibility of use of it by these defendants for the purposes of developing our own case, of discharging our duty to this Court, which is to be fully prepared and to try this case with knowledge of all the facts.

There is no doubt that in the testimony of these witnesses there is much material that we, as well as the Government, should have. The situation of Lever—that I described to you—is a dramatic illustration of the point. The statement of issues that the Government has supplied us, making reference to conversations by telephone and in person, is another dramatic illustration of the point that there is no substitute, your Honor, for the testimony of these witnesses before the grand jury, particularly in view of the passage of time now.

[fol. 1314] I have just a few more things and then I will terminate. I share with Mr. Correa a feeling of astonishment at the Government's claim of privilege in this situation. One of the Government's defenses to our motion is that the transcript of the testimony of witnesses before the grand jury in this Court—grand jury of this Court—that testimony is privileged. And why is it privileged? It is privileged because the Department of Justice had a stenographer who was on its payroll and who wrote this stuff down, and the material was then taken to the Department of Justice, and the lawyers for the Department of Justice say it is privileged.

That is a thoroughly astonishing claim. Obviously that transcript belongs in this Court. I don't know why they took it away. I remember that when the Government wanted to take some documents to Washington that had been produced in the grand jury room here they asked us to consent to it, which we did; but apparently they can take away a grand jury transcript and then claim that it is theirs, if you please—their property—presumably immune from this Court, presumably covered by the internal rules of the Department of Justice, presumably transmuted into a confidential executive communication. They say they can do that with the transcript of what went on before the grand jury of this court.

[fol. 1315] Now, that is a preposterous claim. But the important point to me, your Honor, is that that very claim of privilege discloses a state of mind with respect to grand jury proceedings that is the source of our difficulty there. I don't blame these gentlemen for it. I think it is something that has grown up over the years. What it discloses is this same attitude that I characterized a moment ago, that the transcript of the witnesses before the grand jury is the private property, the privileged property of the Department of Justice that they can use without notice to anybody as an instrument of warfare in a courtroom. I think there is the same mental attitude that leads both to the blanket opposition to our position here and to this astounding claim of privilege.

The claim here really, your Honor, is not that the testimony of witnesses is secret. Nobody can say that, in view of the language of Rule 6(e), in view of the cases. What they are saying is that the testimony of witnesses is something that the Government alone can use, not that it is secret, but that they alone can use for impeachment, for what we call "refreshing the recollection of witnesses." And it is that same frame of mind that has led them just one tiny step beyond that point, that tiny step being to say that this—the proceedings of the grand jury of this Court—is the property of the Attorney General, the executive [fol. 1316] department of the Government, and not subject, presumably, to examination by this Court or to the processes of this Court. Now, obviously the courts are not going to abdicate their functions, as it was put in the Cotton Valley case.

Your Honor, just in summary, I want to say again, if the Government seriously contends that the testimony of witnesses before a grand jury is secret they would be flying right in the face of Rule 6(e) and of the decided cases. If they were seriously interested in preserving the secrecy of the testimony of witnesses—which they can't do anyway, as a matter of law, because they are prohibited from doing it by Rule 6(e)—but if they were seriously interested in doing that, they wouldn't take the transcript to Washington; they wouldn't have it used by the antitrust lawyers—who change, as we know in this very case—for purposes of discovery; they wouldn't claim and reserve the right—as they will certainly do—to use portions of the transcript to refresh the recollection of witnesses, or to impeach them; they would say, "We do not use the transcript for any of those purposes"; they would choose either that alternative, or they would do what I hope your Honor is going to compel them to do in this case, in the Big Case—what I hope your Honor is going to do for reasons of fairness, for reasons of good administration of the Big Case—[fol. 1317] and that is to compel them to make the testimony of the witnesses, only, to make that testimony fully available to the defendants in this cause.

Now, your Honor, if there is any sensitivity as to the secrecy of the testimony of witnesses in this kind of a situation, long after the grand jury has ceased to function, where the grand jury has not returned an indictment, where the Government has used and proposes to use the testimony, if there is any sensitivity as to this protection of the testimony of those witnesses, certainly, beyond any doubt whatever, the consent of those witnesses to that disclosure would eliminate such sensitivity.

Now, I hope your Honor—I respectfully say that I hope your Honor will handle this problem boldly. I don't myself believe that consent is necessary, but it is a conservative device that was adopted by Judge Carter in the Standard Oil case. In this circuit certainly there is in United States against Rose a direct indication that the technique of getting the witnesses' consent might eliminate any possible difficulty. I am reading from page 41 of the Colgate brief. In United States against Rose the Court of Appeals for this circuit said:

“Since all the defendant desires is a transcript of his own testimony, the sanctity of that which transpired before the grand jury is hardly in question. In addition, such [fol. 1318] disclosure would not subvert any of the reasons traditionally given for the inviolability of grand jury proceedings.”

And I say that similarly where the witness consents it is beyond me to see any possible infringement of principle that could possibly be involved. And certainly we are not going to be moved by fanciful and remote fears.

Your Honor, in concluding I would like to call attention to an article that appeared in the Yale Law Journal, and which we did not cite because our brief was written before Mr. McDowell filed his brief. I spoke at the beginning of my argument about a trend. I think, your Honor, that there is a trend towards requiring the Government to make disclosure in appropriate cases. I think that this case is part of that trend. Certainly the cases have been arising with great frequency in the District of Columbia and elsewhere. And I think they are appropriately characterized in a little statement which, with your permission, I would like to read from this article that appeared in the Yale Law Journal, Volume 59, at page 1451. It is for December, 1950. It is an article called Government Immunity from Discovery.

"No one has more eagerly resorted to the discovery machinery than the Government; no one has been more grudging in making it reciprocally available." They are citing cases here. "Viewed against traditional notions [fol. 1319] of fair play it is not surprising that Government attempts to 'thwart the efforts of a plaintiff' to obtain disclosure have been judicially labeled as 'unseemly,' as an 'unjust and tyrannical exercise of power.'" Citing cases. "As former Attorney General Mitchell said, 'it ought not to be necessary to resort to discovery against the Government' for the Government litigates with its citizens and ought to be frank and fair and disclose all the facts."

The Court: The only trouble, Mr. Fortas, is that an Attorney General never says that until he is the former Attorney General. That is when they become very much interested in the public welfare.

Mr. Fortas: That is perfectly true, your Honor.

The Court: Isn't it funny how the philosophy changes.

Mr. Fortas: For the reasons stated, your Honor, I respectfully urge that the motions be granted.

The Court: Now, how many more for the defendants, the General and who else?

Mr. Royall: Your Honor, except for the little matter that was left open about the questions asked Mr. Siddall on the grand jury matters, which will almost certainly follow the disposition of this—and I may have to say a word or two later, but I don't think so—except for that I want to merely [fol. 1320] say that our interests and our views are the same as the other defendants. They have fully presented the considerations. You have before you three briefs from us, including the one in the Siddall matter. It seems to me that I would be wasting time to try to add to the positions stated by other defendants' counsel. Unless your Honor desires me to do so, or has any questions to propound, I will just adopt their argument for myself.

The Court: You may well do so. Any other defendants to be heard from?

Mr. McDowell, we will take a little rest now before you start.

(Short recess.)

The Court: Mr. Fortas, in your moving papers you did request a list of witnesses.

Mr. Fortas: Yes.

The Court: Are you still interested in that?

Mr. Fortas: Yes, your Honor. It may be entirely academic. That is to say—

The Court: Depending on how I decide it.

Mr. Fortas: Yes.

The Court: All right. Now, Mr. McDowell.

STATEMENT BY MR. McDOWELL

Mr. McDowell: Your Honor, I recognize that there are many inequalities and many kinds of unfairness which are unavoidable in the trial of any case, even perhaps in cases other than antitrust cases.

[fol. 1321] The Court: Yes, I found out the other day in a tax situation where I had the distinction of being reversed by the Circuit Court of Appeals, in which they said the result was very harsh—but that's too bad.

Mr. McDowell: Your Honor, I think perhaps sometimes it is a mistake to take completely literally the model which appears before my eyes here—fiat justitia, ruat coelum. Sometimes there are people who don't like the heavens to fall.

The Court: No, because if the heavens were to fall you wouldn't have any justice, either.

Mr. McDowell: And that is our position here, your Honor.

Despite the attractiveness of the propositions put forward. We concede many of them are, on first blush, not without considerable persuasion.

But, your Honor, one of the kinds of unfairness which I think we can spare the defendants today is the necessity of having to speak with four voices whereas the Government is free to speak with but one voice. In order to spare them that unfairness today I brought Mr. Carlson and Mr. Margolis along. And if the Court will grant us that privilege, I would like to ask Mr. Carlson to discuss the first group of problems which we see here, which go to the policy of the courts with respect to the privilege of [fol. 1322] grand jury secrecy. And then I would like for Mr. Margolis to address himself to the particular reasons which require in this case, as well as in cases generally involving the use of the grand jury, that secrecy be observed. And then if it should be necessary perhaps I may say a word again about the problem of privilege. Your Honor, I don't think in all we will take an hour.

The Court: Don't worry about the time. This is a very important question and I want it thoroughly discussed. All that I don't want is repetition by any of the speakers. I happen to be fortunate in having a retentive memory.

STATEMENT BY MR. CARLSON

Mr. Carlson: The Court asked us to primarily direct ourselves to rebuttal material. The first matter I have to take up is only in part directed to that.

The Court has two cases directly in point on the question we are involved with here. And those cases are the Rose case, which says that grand jury transcripts are secret, and the G. M. case. And nowhere in argument of counsel have I seen either of those cases distinguished. The rule remains. And it is not a rule that applies just to any particular element of the grand jury, but it applies to the transcript which the defendants are here seeking.

The Court in its remarks, in the memorandum that you addressed to counsel today, made one statement as to the [fol. 1323] rule in grand jury matters, grand jury transcripts, the disclosure of grand jury transcripts, and then said that there were some exceptions.

The Government's position is essentially that the only exception that we know of that has support of the cases, where grand jury transcripts have been delivered to the defendant, is in a perjury situation. And, as your Honor knows, that is a special situation.

The Court: Oh, yes, indeed. Nobody can deny that under such circumstances a man should have the transcript, should know what he said.

Mr. Carlson: That's right, the act for which he is being tried is one that occurred right in the grand jury room. So the Government has to breach the secrecy in order to bring the prosecution. And it is natural in a fair trial, as an incident to the fair trial, that the defendant have his own testimony.

Now, the Remington case—that is the case on which the Court relied in the Rose case—did allow the defendant his own testimony. The Remington case went on to say that Remington had no right to Remington's former wife's testimony unless certain special circumstances were called into view. Those circumstances, I believe, are that it should be shown that the witness involved, other than the defendant, is a turnabout witness.

[fol. 1324] The Court: Yes, unfriendly.

Mr. Carlson: That's right. And also that the judge doesn't have to dig through the length of the transcript and, in effect, become an advocate for the defendant.

And that, I apprehend, and we take the position, is a special situation, just as most of these situations—in fact, all of them we know about are—in which disclosure has been had.

The Court: Do you mind if I think out loud a minute on the Remington case?

Mr. Carlson: No, sir.

The Court: If a man tells the truth about any given situation why must he see his testimony before a grand jury? There is only one truth, isn't there?

Mr. Carlson: That's right.

The Court: And if he told the truth, why must he have a transcript of what he said in the grand jury room?

Mr. Carlson: We are even in a different position now than we used to be on that subject, your Honor.

The Court: I am only talking about Remington now. I am thinking out loud about Remington.

Mr. Carlson: It used to be, as you recall, the law was that—in certain districts, at least—the accused would be sworn and he couldn't even talk about what he said before [fol. 1325] the grand jury—the witness, that is. In that situation the witness was faced with a very difficult problem. He couldn't communicate to his attorney as to the subject matter on which he had been examined. That is not the situation any more. And the defendants in these cases, in all the cases, now have access to what the witnesses' story is, at least certainly as far as their own people are concerned.

And here we are concerned primarily with that, in that Rule 6(e) now states within its terms that no obligation of secrecy shall be imposed other than stated therein. That removes that former situation in which the witness couldn't find out what his rights were.

- So what we are left with, your Honor, is a rule that grand jury transcripts should be secret.

And the rule has a very good reason behind it. And that is not a reason that goes to prosecution or the use by the Government of any particular grand jury transcripts, or the value of any particular fact that may be brought out, but the rule goes to protection of the grand jury itself, keeping the grand jury an independent body, where it can act, not on behalf of the Government, not on behalf of the Executive, and not necessarily on behalf of the Court, but as an independent arm to prevent any kind of oppression or injustice that may arise. The grand jury can take [fol. 1326] cognizance of any of these things and has often done so. And that is the real basic reason for protection of the grand jury and protection of the transcript.

The Court in its memorandum made reference to the Herzog case. Our research did not reflect any citation from the Herzog case that would indicate that the lower court had ruled upon the matter raised by Justice Douglas as to the substantial question that was involved.

I might say, however, that whatever the lower court would hold on that, I think it would not be any assistance for us here because the situation that was involved in the Herzog case was that same situation, I believe, which involved Remington's wife in the Remington case. That is, a turnabout witness was involved. Justice Douglas quoted at length from the Alper case and indicated that if these special situations were to be called into play a substantial question would be raised for the Circuit Court to pass upon, which would allow defendant bail.

So even if the Circuit Court holds in that particular case that the District Court when the trial is had should look at the testimony—and the Court did not make clear whether the District Court should look at it or the witness should have it—even if the Circuit Court held that the District Court should look at that testimony, within the rule of the Alper case—and I might note in passing that [fol. 1327] the Alper case ruling merely meant looking at the transcript by the judge and not making it available to the defendant. I can't see any way that that would help the defendants here. And they, as I understand it, seek to roam at will through the grand jury transcript, just lay the whole thing bare. So, really, the ruling is a much more limited ruling and on that specific trial situation.

If memory serves me right, the point that the Court asked us to discuss today was the reliance that may or may not have been placed upon the Garsson case by Judge Leahy and his ruling in the General Motors case.

From the opinion I find it difficult to draw the conclusion that Judge Leahy decided on anything but the merits of the situation before him. His opinion reflects that he took into consideration many of the questions raised by counsel here. And he says—I am not sure I have the page number on this, I think it is at 486 and 487—one statement he makes in reaching his conclusion is, “I do not find in the present action for civil penalties any justification for ordering production or inspection and copying the transcripts of the grand jury's meetings.”

It is pretty plain that he must have been speaking about just exactly what is in point here, regardless of what view he may have taken of the holding in the Garsson case. And the Government takes the position that the General Motors [fol. 1328] case is indistinguishable from the facts here. At least I have heard nothing here today from defense counsel that would distinguish Judge Leahy's opinion.

One thing that counsel have alluded to is that the General Motors case, since it was before the Rose case, is in some way overturned, or at least rendered inapplicable by the Rose case. That is a very difficult thing to understand; for the Rose case stood for the proposition that grand jury transcripts are secret, and called forth a particular transcript in a particular instance.

The General Motors case also stands for the proposition that grand jury transcripts are secret. There they are in the court and the Court says, “You just haven't shown me any reason for disclosure.”

I believe those are all the points that I had to make to your Honor. So I will defer to Mr. Margolis.

The Court: Thank you.

STATEMENT BY MR. MARGOLIS

Mr. Margolis: As Mr. McDowell told your Honor, I am going to confine my remarks primarily to the reasons why the Government says here that the defendants haven't suggested really, as we view the situation, any reason why the traditional rule of secrecy surrounding grand jury proceedings should be lifted here. I think your Honor put it that public policy in the enforcement of the criminal anti-trust laws outweigh such an asserted right.

[fol. 1329] The Rose case was preceded—or the reasons given in the Rose case were summarized from an earlier case, United States v. Amazon Industrial Chemical Corporation. And the quotation which appears in, I think, the briefs of all counsel for the defendants from the Rose case omits the very next paragraph which was included in the Amazon case. And with your Honor's indulgence I would like to read that to you.

“It is obvious that the basis of all but the last of these reasons for secrecy is protection of the grand jury itself as the direct independent representative of the public as a whole rather than those brought before the grand jury. Of course, these latter are intended directly to share in the benefits from this rule of secrecy.”

That quotation is from the Court in the Amazon case—and the Rose case doesn't quote it either—but the point I would like to make now is that, as I understand counsel for Colgate, particularly, in this situation he says the reasons for disclosing the grand jury transcript are weighty reasons and to do justice your Honor should really permit the defendants to see the transcript.

But this, it seems to us, overlooks the traditional reasons given for preserving the transcript and the secrecy, namely, not that the particular witnesses, or the particular grand [fol. 1330] jury in this instance would be plagued, or importuned, or that there might be subornation of perjury, but that it would create a very dangerous precedent and that it would, in effect, make it virtually impossible for future grand juries to conduct their affairs expeditiously and efficiently and to discover whether or not a crime had been committed.

Now, I was very interested to hear counsel for the Association recognize the fact that the antitrust laws—the Sherman Act basically describes conduct which is criminal and it declares such conduct to be unlawful.

And then Section 4 of the Sherman Act, of course, gives the Government an alternative remedy. They can come into court and seek civil relief, if such relief seems to be suggested in the circumstances.

Now, a case which the Government cited in its brief, which we filed on December 7th, I think supports this and gives added weight to it. It is the quotation which appears on page 19 from the Deere case—United States v. Deere, 9 F.R.D. 523. And, as your Honor will note, the Court there said, with respect to the antitrust laws, and the privilege of the Government to maintain in secrecy certain information obtained during the course of an investigation—or during the course of a trial, or during the course of preparation for trial of an antitrust case:

“Actions under the antitrust act, however, are clearly [fol. 1331] actions based upon the public interest. This is apparent from the very nature of the laws, for they are designed to protect the commerce of the nation and their violation in many instances constitutes criminal activity. Although the instant action is not a criminal action, the basis of the privilege is one of public policy for protection of the public interest, not the criminal nature of the case. It is for the protection of any person——”

The Court: Oh, no, you misread that. “It is not for the protection——”

Mr. Margolis: I am sorry. “It is not for the protection of any person. The considerations which require the withholding of information and its source from the accused by the Government in criminal cases are present also in civil antitrust actions brought for the public interest by the Government.”

Now, your Honor, the Government contends that this is a principle which this Court and all courts should recognize with respect to investigations which have been conducted by the grand jury, that they, too, are in the public interest and that the information which is obtained by the grand jury can only really be obtained if the persons who testify before that body feel free to speak forthrightly. I think Rule 4, stated in the Rose case, puts it much better than I can, that the witnesses should feel free [fol. 1332] to—

The Court: You mean to encourage free and untrammelled—

Mr. Margolis: —to encourage free and untrammelled disclosures by the witness.

Now, in this particular situation, where you have an investigation conducted concerning activities which may violate the antitrust laws; economic, business reasons, virtually all of the witnesses during the course of any investigation of antitrust violations are apt to be either employees or business associates of potential defendants. Such persons, we suggest, are peculiarly susceptible to pressures. If they are going to speak forthrightly at all, they will probably do so more easily if they feel that their testimony before the grand jury, at least, is secret.

Now, it is true, they may consent at some future date to the disclosure of their testimony. However, if a precedent is created, that it becomes generally known throughout the land that testimony before a grand jury may become public knowledge, that they may be asked to give their consent, they may withhold a little more from the grand jury than they otherwise might.

These pressures—I want to make it clear, I am not trying to suggest that the defendants in this case would, in any [fol. 1333] way, be guilty of applying such pressures, but the Government, as you know, is conducting investigations throughout the nation at all time of these and other matters, and less respectable defendants might feel inclined to apply the pressure to their employees to guide their testimony, so to speak, before the grand jury.

Now, this is a very real danger, disclosing transcript, even upon consent, when the consent could be obtained perhaps by pressures. This would make it virtually impossible for the Government to effectively discover anything about criminal conduct. And particularly this is true, we suggest, where the investigation is concerned with economic activity.

Now, there is a case that we did not cite in our brief which we feel is also pertinent to the situation here. It is a Third Circuit case, Allmont v. United States. And that case involves——

The Court: What is the citation?

Mr. Margolis: It is 177 Fed. (2d) 971, Third Circuit, 1949.

That was not an attempt to obtain grand jury testimony. But the language of the Court there, we suggest, is very pertinent to the situation which your Honor has before him, where you must decide whether the equities on the side of the defendants for obtaining this information outweigh [fol. 1334] the tremendous and traditional secrecy rule which is surrounding grand jury proceedings.

Now, there the Court said, with respect to an attempt to get statements of witnesses under Rule 33, and the defendants suggested—and the lower court held—that the best records of these statements would be the actual statements obtained by the Government from the witnesses. And in addition to requiring the Government to answer the interrogatories the lower court required the Government to append those statements obtained from the witnesses. And the Court of Appeals said this:

“The rules”—speaking of the Civil Rules of Procedure—“however, do not give a party an absolute right to obtain either the text or a resumé of the statements which the adverse party has obtained from the persons whom he or his agents have seen. Having obtained information as to the existence, nature and location of the statements through interrogatories he is in a position to move for their production under Civil Procedure Rule 34 or Admiralty Rule 32”—that was an Admiralty case—“but he must in every case make the showing of good cause required by those rules for their production. In other words, he must show that there are special circumstances in his particular case which make it essential to the preparation of his case and in the interest of justice that the statements be produced for his inspection or copying. His counsel's natural desire [fol. 1335] to learn the details of his adversary's preparation for trial, to take advantage of his adversary's industry in seeking out and interviewing prospective witnesses, to help prepare himself to examine witnesses, or to make sure that he has overlooked nothing, are certainly not such circumstances since they are present in every case."

Now, in the situation confronting your Honor here the defendants admit freely, particularly Colgate in its brief says, "We know the names of 28 of the witnesses," and they believe that these are all, or virtually all, of the witnesses who appeared before the grand jury. Defense counsel also suggests, however, that a long time has passed since the grand jury convened, but none of them have made the statement, that I have heard—nor does it appear in their brief—that they did not, or that they were precluded from interviewing these witnesses as they came out of the grand jury room. Nor do they suggest that it would not have been possible for them to take depositions three years ago, immediately after the case was filed. But they say, "Well, a long time has passed and these witnesses may well have forgotten exactly what they said before the grand jury." But as your Honor pointed out, in colloquy with Mr. Carlson, if they spoke the truth once there is no reason to believe that they wouldn't speak the truth again at a deposition, or really that they don't remember the facts [fol. 1336] about the transactions about which they testified before the grand jury. And the Government suggests that the defendants have really shown no reason why it is essential to the preparation of their case, in the case now pending here, for them to have these transcripts, and violate—or invade the secret province of the grand jury when to do so could do nothing but harm the institution.

The Government really is here today, as well as a litigant in United States v. Procter & Gamble—it is here acting in the public interest, trying to protect the grand jury system, the whole process.

Of course, we have an interest in it, because as representatives of the state we have to be present to hear what crimes have been committed, and take the transcript, and to prosecute those crimes. It would make it virtually impossible for us to do our job, we feel, if the transcripts were disclosed, and would not substantially or materially benefit the defendants in this case if the transcripts were disclosed to them.

The Court: Is it always the practice of the Department of Justice to take the transcript of grand jury proceedings to Washington?

Mr. Margolis: Your Honor, I believe it is not. I think there are cases in which no transcripts are taken. They are very rare. I know of no one in my particular experience [fol. 1337] but I have heard this is the fact.

The Court: I was United States Attorney here for some three years. I never knew them to take one transcript of a grand jury proceeding while I was here.

Mr. McDowell: Your Honor, may I add to the answer?

The Court: Yes, sir.

FURTHER STATEMENT BY MR. McDOWELL.

Mr. McDowell: It is my understanding that the practice depends upon the particular office having supervision and direct responsibility over the particular investigation, the grand jury investigation involved. In the great mass of cases the grand jury investigations are conducted by the United States Attorney, or Assistant United States Attorneys, and those transcripts are customarily kept by them, in their offices.

The Court: Yes.

Mr. McDowell: But in those cases where attorneys are sent out from Washington, as is ordinarily the case in antitrust matters, because there isn't sufficient in any individual district to justify having attorneys specialized in such matters, then customarily the transcripts are taken by the attorneys to Washington.

I think that makes a convenient starting point for this whole question of claim of privilege here involved. I would like to put that thing in perspective a bit, if I [fol. 1338] may, by clearing up some apparent misunderstanding about the exact nature of the privilege which the Government considers to be involved here.

As we view it, we are not arguing upon your Honor some narrow property interest of the Department of Justice in a particular piece of paper. I felt it was necessary to make the point in the brief that the transcript, as such, is the property of the Department, because of the point made by Colgate in its brief—apparently in anticipation of the Department's position here—to the effect—said the Colgate brief—that there would be no basis, in any event, for any claim of privilege by the Government here because the transcripts were not in the custody or possession of the Department of Justice, but, rather, were in the custody and possession of the Court.

Now, I think that is a formality which need not be emphasized, but may be necessary to a formal claim of privilege. I don't say that it is necessary, but it may be, and I didn't want to overlook it, because of the apparent importance given to it by Colgate. So that I think we must recognize that there is a property right by the Department in the transcripts. And if that is necessary to the assertion of the claim of privilege, then that requirement is satisfied. [fol. 1339] But the privilege with which we are concerned here is the grand jury privilege, it is not a particular privilege of the Government; it is a privilege, if you will, of "the people", in the original meaning of the term, "the people", as used in the Constitution of the United States. As your Honor will recall, the recital begins, "We, the people." The grand jury had its roots in the interests of the people in the redress of grievances and protection from unjustified and unwarranted accusations.

The Court: You probably have never read the arguments by those who claim the grand jury's usefulness has ceased a long time ago and give very cogent reasons why you don't need a grand jury any more. Did you ever read them? A lot of brilliant men have written on that in the last generation.

Mr. McDowell: Your Honor, I have seen some argument to that effect, but I may say—

The Court: Some are quite persuasive.

Mr. McDowell: I may say, the arguments that I have seen to that effect have not been very persuasive to me.

The Court: Do the reasons exist now for the grand jury that existed at the time it was originally created, when you had tyrannical kings and despots?

Mr. McDowell: I think perhaps it is even more necessary today.

[fol. 1340] The Court: Do you think so? With all our liberties and protection of liberties, do you think the grand jury is more necessary than it was five centuries ago?

Mr. McDowell: I do, your Honor.

The Court: Very good.

Mr. McDowell: For this reason, that, depending upon your particular views as to the function of government, you may welcome it or regret it, but there has been in our time a tremendous growth in the function of government, and with that a growth in power, and with that an opportunity for abuse.

The Court: Agreed. Go ahead.

Mr. McDowell: And the grand jury stands today, I think, just as strongly as it stood in the days of Magna Carta, in the days of the Constitutions of Clarendon, in 1174, for the protection of the people from the abusive exercise of the power of government. We don't witness that very often. Fortunately we haven't had the kind of occasions that call it into play, but it is not more than sixty years ago that a so-called runaway grand jury in New York City, just across the river, was instrumental in relieving the people of New York from the tyrannous abuses of an administration dominated by a corrupt—

The Court: Are you referring to the Seabury investigation?

[fol. 1341] Mr. McDowell: No, your Honor, I am referring to Boss Tweed. That's a bit more than sixty years. I am sorry.

The Court: Yes, sir.

Mr. McDowell: It's about eighty years.

The Court: It's about eighty years ago now.

Mr. McDowell: Yes, your Honor.

The Court: We have had men since then who made Boss Tweed look like petty larceny. Only they do it in a much finer way now. They are not quite so raw as Boss Tweed was.

Mr. McDowell: Your Honor, it is an extremely interesting subject, and I think that your last comment—

The Court: I am thankful that we still have the grand jury, and I am thankful that we have petit juries, too, believe me, despite all the cogent arguments against them.

Mr. McDowell: I merely wanted to bring the point out, your Honor, that there is something more at stake here than the mere—

The Court: Than the Procter & Gamble case, you mean?

Mr. McDowell: Yes, your Honor.

The Court: That is why I was interested in hearing from you.

[fol. 1342] Mr. McDowell: And more than the position of the Government as a litigant in a particular case. I don't think it is necessary to say more about that, your Honor, other than perhaps to note one comment you made in your remarks about the portion of the Government's brief beginning on page 19, which is addressed to the question of privilege. And I would like to say there that I think it is true, the essential question is whether or not the grand jury privilege exists and exists here in such scope that it must be recognized, and would have to be recognized by the Court even if the Government didn't assert the privilege, because the Court is just as interested in the safeguarding of the grand jury function as the Government is, perhaps more so. But the cases set forth there are put in the brief for the purpose of giving your Honor a lead to the cases which we feel express the principles relating to this problem of governmental privilege, and give some indication of the way in which the courts in recent leading cases have approached the resolution of the problems there.

And primarily those cases are for the purpose of leading up to the Reynolds case, which is a recent authoritative ruling occasioned by the problem which came up in this circuit. And I think your Honor undoubtedly has had occasion to read and consider the ruling, in connection with other matters, of Judge Maris of this circuit in the Reynolds case. And your Honor may recall Judge Maris [fol. 1343] held there that the lower court had correctly required that the privileged matter be produced, giving serious discussion to the whole problem of privilege and recognizing the scope of the privilege, but giving primary emphasis to the requirement of the plaintiffs in that case to have those very accident reports in order to make out a case at all.

Unlike the situation here, the Reynolds case, where there had been a crash of an airplane, a Government plane carrying secret equipment, the plaintiffs contended—and I think with good reason, as Judge Maris so found—that they could not prepare their case, they could not ascertain what the facts were about that crash, and about the problem of negligence, and so forth, if they couldn't see the statements and the reports of investigation which the Government itself had made. And yet despite the cogency and persuasiveness of the reasoning there the Supreme Court found that there are matters which override the interests of a particular litigant in a particular case, not in an arbitrary fashion. That was why I came down to the Reynolds case, your Honor, to illustrate the technique of the decision.

And I think that is the problem with which your Honor is confronted here. When you have a collision between two fundamental public policies, such as the policy to [fol. 1344] which I do not wish to yield to the defendants in supporting, and that is the policy of disclosure in civil discovery—when you have a conflict, such as here, between the public policy and the public policy which protects the secrecy of the grand jury, then the Court is called upon to weigh carefully the precise considerations which are advanced in support of the claim that in this case disclosure must be made. And only in so far as something can be said on that side which becomes persuasive to the Court is there occasion for considering a decision contrary to a fundamental public policy guarding the secrecy of matter which has been privileged down through the generations in the way in which grand jury testimony has been privileged.

Now, in our view, your Honor, the defendants have said nothing here which would justify giving serious consideration to the claim they advance for this transcript, when it is all stripped away. As I listened, and I tried to get down to what reasons they could advance, I couldn't help but feel that there were two themes only underlying the whole business: One, the suggestion that a witness may have forgotten, and when he gets around to the testimony at the trial he may be confronted with some inconsistent statement made earlier. I don't think that needs serious consideration.

[fol. 1345] The other is at first attractive, but I think it lacks substance. That is the proposition that there is some unfairness here, that the Government has used, or abused, if you will, the grand jury process for the purposes of civil discovery. Counsel have, in response to your Honor's questioning—as I understood counsel—asserted that they do not maintain there is any abouse, or been any abuse by the Government. So that it really comes to a question that they think just because the Government has had a chance to record statements by these people in connection with a grand jury investigation, which may or may not have covered these points, then they should have the opportunity of seeing that. And were it not for the grand jury—for the fact that the examination was conducted before a grand jury, I would think that there would be some weight to be given to their claim. But we don't seem to meet—or see eye to eye on this problem of the grand jury thing.

The Court: I didn't think you would. In fact, I would have been shocked if you had agreed with them.

Mr. McDowell: Now, your Honor has directed a question specifically to me which I find it hard to answer. Before coming to that, may I say, in order to clarify—

The Court: I only asked you that because of the problem that is now pending before Judge Hartshorne where [fol. 1346] they are asking them in interrogatories.

Mr. McDowell: Your Honor, I would just suggest one proposition there and that is that it isn't possible to set this case, the Big Case, to one side and say, "This is it. It is only here in this unusual situation, just in this civil discovery." If you are going to give the defendants in an antitrust case the transcript, why shouldn't defendants in other civil cases have the transcripts?

The Court: That doesn't necessarily follow at all, Mr. McDowell. I don't agree with you at all, because the Big Case is certainly sui generis, in my opinion. There is nothing like it, and no judge relishes hearing it. But what I don't want to be confronted with during this trial is constant adjournments, as has happened already in these antitrust suits—surprise, surprise, surprise—and which may happen very easily.

That is all I have in mind, the organization of the case, to try it efficiently and expeditiously.

Mr. McDowell: I assure you, your Honor, that in the little antitrust cases that I have seen the defendants feel quite as put upon as the defendants in this big antitrust case. And I can imagine that they would feel just as entitled to see the transcripts of relevant testimony, where there had been a precedent grand jury investigation, as [fol. 1347] these defendants. And I must say, your Honor, that I think it would be hard to draw the line.

The Court: But we do arbitrarily draw lines, don't we, in courts? All we have to say is that the facts here are different than they are in other cases. And that settles it. Doesn't the Supreme Court say that often? "But the facts here are different"—period. If they don't like it, there is nothing you can do about it. "We distinguish it"—for this reason or that reason—and then they vote four-to-four on it, showing that honest men can differ—honestly, too.

I am not saying that they have no right to differ, because if I believe a certain way—I am just as stubborn as anybody else. I am not a "go along" judge, either. But there are situations, Mr. McDowell, where people can honestly differ and both be sincere—very sincere, too.

Mr. McDowell: I quite agree, your Honor. I merely wanted to suggest that it does not necessarily follow that you have a unique situation here and that what is done here would not become a precedent which might not lead to results in other cases. That is the growth of the law.

The Court:—we are told that lawyers and the public shouldn't worry about conflicts between the circuits, that is what the Supreme Court is there for. But when they don't [fol. 1348] take these cases up to the Supreme Court then the sitting judge has to stew with them. This circuit says so and so and that circuit says just the opposite. And the Government is "great" for not taking them up, either, when they think they might lose. I have noticed that. I just had one in a freight rate case. I wondered why they didn't take it up.

And these are problems we have in the law, Mr. McDowell. Fortunately we have a very orderly way of deciding it: If the trial judge is wrong, the circuit; if they are wrong, the Supreme Court; if they are wrong, that's too bad.

I have had a lawyer come here and tell me, when the New Jersey Supreme Court decided unanimously against him, "I still think they are wrong, Judge Modarelli."

And I think he meant it, too, for this lawyer, still thinks they are wrong.

Well, it's the old Irishman's story. He was open to conviction, but nobody could ever convince him.

Mr. McDowell: Well, your Honor, I had a case in this very court which the Supreme Court reversed where I thought we had won. I don't know how the judge in this district feels about it, but I think the Supreme Court decided wrongly.

The Court: You see, you were so concerned that you [fol. 1349] were right about it. See, a lawyer can become evangelical, too, about situations.

Mr. McDowell: I quite agree with that, your Honor.

The Court: You have heard them and so have I. I have had lawyers stand and tell the jury, "You can't convict my man." And, believe it or not, Mr. McDowell, they did—in ten minutes. In ten minutes they came back, "Guilty."

Mr. McDowell: Your Honor, I made the mistake of telling a judge last year that he couldn't do so and so on a motion for a bill of particulars.

The Court: But he did.

Mr. McDowell: The judge said, "What do you mean, Mr. McDowell? I have done that. You may sit down."

The Court: Well, somebody has to have the final word, you know.

Mr. McDowell: Well, your Honor, as far as I am concerned, I have said all that I have had to say, and you may have the final word.

The Court: Now, Mr. McDowell, I take it that nobody of the Government agrees with Professor Wigmore at all, do they?

Mr. McDowell: Well, we have some trouble about Professor Wigmore, your Honor.

[fol. 1350] The Court: He is considered an eminent authority. I don't say I agree with him yet, don't get that impression from what I say. I am trying to search out your mind and everybody else's.

Wigmore usually gives a lot of thought to anything that he gives voice to. And he spends all his time doing that. He doesn't have to prepare cases, write briefs, or sit in trials. That is all he does—philosophize. Like my friend, Dean Pound. He is always philosophizing. He says to me, "You haven't time to philosophize. You are a trial judge in a district. You haven't time to philosophize. They keep you too busy."

You can only philosophize when you have a lot of time on your hands. You can be sure that I don't have, nor do any of my brothers in this district have a lot of time on their hands.

What do you think of Wigmore's ideas on the subject?

Mr. McDowell: Well, your Honor, let me say very briefly what we think about that proposition. Dean Wigmore has stressed, by reason of his analytical, evidentiary approach, the question of the privilege which the witness may assert. And he concludes that the witness, in effect, has no privilege—

The Court: That's right.

[fol. 1351] Mr. McDowell:—after the grand jury has ceased to function. But in doing that he overlooks—and when he gets down to the conclusion he overlooks a statement which he made in his earlier analysis, in which Dean Wigmore conceded, by implication, that the privilege is not entirely or alone that of the witness. Only the privilege of the witness is what he is concerned about when he gets down to his conclusion. But he says above, in clearing the ground for his analysis in his argument, he says that privilege is not entirely that of the state or of the people, thus conceding that the privilege is—in part, at least, that of the state, although he is not concerned with that question for the purpose of his argument.

And in another place he says that the privilege grows out of the public interest in the protection of the grand jury institution.

So that Dean Wigmore himself has recognized, we think, fundamentally, the interest of the state. He has moved on into the question of the circumstances under which the particular witness may claim privilege. I think if this particular question were to be fitted into his rationale he would say, as does the Government here, that it makes no difference that a grand jury has ceased, it makes no difference that the witness may be content to waive, the [fol. 1352] public interest still overrides that. And I am led to that by the conclusion which he reached when his attention was drawn to an analogous point in connection with the informer's privilege—very closely related.

The informer's privilege, I submit, your Honor, is very closely related to that of the grand jury privilege. The same public rationale applies, the public policy of encouraging people to give knowledge within their possession freely to the Government, or to prosecuting authorities, under an express or implied assumption and practice that their identity, their communication is going to be kept secret, privileged. And Dean Wigmore says, in Section 2374—and I didn't put this in our brief, your Honor—that the informer's privilege is a "genuine privilege", by which, I assume he means absolute.

And then, if I may quote a little bit more, he said, "The privilege must be recognized, for the communications made by informers to official prosecutors because such communications ought to receive encouragement and because that confidence which will lead to such communications can be created only by holding out immunity from a compulsory disclosure of the informant's identity."

But it is implicit in Dean Wigmore's discussion of that point that the witness may not waive. He does not criticize, for example, some of the cases which have applied [fol. 1353] the doctrine that the informer may not waive privilege—it is the privilege of the state, not the privilege of the informer.

Your Honor, I didn't go into that in the brief, but may I just mention one or two of the leading cases, since you have raised the question, and it is so closely related to Dean Wigmore's argument? The leading case on the scope and application of the informer's privilege is Worthington v. Scribner, 409 Massachusetts, 487—a rather old case, 1872. One of the most frequently cited later cases in the Federal Courts is Firth Sterling Steel Co. v. Bethlehem Steel Co., 199 Federal 353. That was in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

There are other cases applying that doctrine, that the informer may not waive, because it is the privilege of the public, not of the informer. A number of those cases are collected and discussed in an article, an interesting article, in the Vanderbilt Law Review, 3 Vanderbilt Law Review 73 and 76.

Now, along the same line, your Honor, there is a very trenchant analysis of this whole problem of the privilege claim, and the public policy considerations in the Kohler case, which I also did not cite in our brief. That's U. S. v. Kohler, 9 F.R.D. 289. That was a decision by Judge Kirkpatrick in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. and on [fol. 1354] the very narrow question which Mr. Fortas said, at the end, he still will press; of application for the names of the witnesses, that was denied in the Central States case, your Honor. Another case which, I am sorry, is not in our brief. May I give the citation for that? United States v. Central Supply Association, 34 F. Supp. 241. That's in the Northern District of Ohio, 1940.

Have I answered your question about Dean Wigmore?

The Court: Yes, sir; if public policy should be considered.

Now, I ask you about the possibility of getting an affidavit.

Mr. McDowell: Oh, yes. Thank you, your Honor.

The Court: I don't know whether you are free to answer that now, or whether you must consult the higher echelons of the Department, as to whether they think it should be done or shouldn't be done. I don't want to embarrass in the least, Mr. McDowell, I assure you of that. If you are not free to answer without consultation, you just say so. But I would like an answer one way or the other.

Mr. McDowell: Well, your Honor, as far as I am concerned—my personal view—I have no reluctance whatever to furnish such an affidavit. On the other hand, an affidavit from me, I am afraid, would be of little value, [fol. 1355] because I had no connection with this case until last year, and I really would be unable to address myself to anything except the third point of your Honor's questionnaire, and that is as to what use the Government might make at the trial.

And I must say, your Honor, I listened with great interest here to Mr. Fortas dwell upon the use which the Government is going to make of this transcript at the trial. I had rather thought that was going to be a question for your Honor to decide. You know, these cases—the Socony-Vacuum case, these other cases to which all these references were made—those were criminal cases. The doctrine is well established in the criminal law that transcript may be used for impeachment or refreshment. I don't know of any such doctrine in a civil case, where there has been precedent grand jury testimony.

My own view—and I say this without prejudice, your Honor; I have given some consideration to it—my own view is that if the occasion should arise in the trial of this case where I would think that it might be appropriate or desirable to refer to a transcript of grand jury testimony, my view would be that question should be submitted to the Court for advice and ruling as to whether or not it would be appropriate.

The Court: I have never had anyone try it on the civil [fol. 1356] side, I will admit that, in the five years I have been here.

Mr. McDowell: Your Honor, in so far as the advisability of getting such a statement and affidavit, as you have suggested, I really question what utility it would have. I think that the fundamentals are pretty clear here, that Rule 6(e) authorizes the Government attorneys to use this transcript in the performance of their duties. Now, when the grand jury investigation involves an investigation under a criminal statute, such as the antitrust laws, query: During the pendency of the grand jury what limitations, if any, there are upon the development of information by the Government from all sorts of sources, including the grand jury source?

Certainly, so far as disclosure is concerned, that would be improper and certainly that is forbidden, expressly, by Rule 6(e), which we observe. And I may say, these transcripts are not thrown about lightly. They are treated with considerable care.

So that I question, your Honor, what the value of such an affidavit would be. But if your Honor wishes me to, I would—

The Court: Or a statement. I don't have to have a sworn affidavit.

Mr. McDowell: Pardon?

[fol. 1357] The Court: A statement will do, for my purposes.

Mr. McDowell: Well, your Honor, I was going to say this, as you have probably gathered from the briefs which we filed a short time ago, since the rather surprising pronouncement by Judge Carter of his views about this matter, this question has been receiving some attention in the Department of Justice in various circles. And I may say that it appears to be a pretty serious problem. For that reason, because I am not as free in the conduct of the Government's case on this point as ordinarily Government counsel are, I would prefer to discuss that question with my superiors before undertaking to answer, as to whether or not we should file such a statement.

Your Honor is aware that some of these cases which the defendants cited are cases in which, technically, there is no breach of the secrecy of the grand jury by the Court in releasing the transcript, but there has been some partial disclosure to the defendants justified by courts because of references made by the Government in argument about the matter to the transcript. And I have tried to be very careful not to say anything. I, too, could speculate at great length, the way the defendants do, about the use made here but I think it is sufficient to point out that it is all speculation and I don't propose to enter into it. And I think, for that reason, the furnishing of such a statement [fol. 1358] as your Honor has suggested might raise some serious question here. And I would prefer to discuss that with my superiors.

The Court: All right, sir.

COLLOQUY BETWEEN COURT AND COUNSEL

Mr. Correa: May I have just a word, your Honor?

The Court: Well, I don't want to start hearing everybody again. It is now 4:25.

Mr. Royall: Your Honor, I have got to reply to your Honor.

The Court: What have you got to reply to about Mr. Siddall?

Mr. Royall: Something you said, sir, I have got to reply to. I have nothing to reply to these gentlemen, but I have to your Honor. But these gentlemen spoke first, so I am not trying to get in their way. But I will have to have a few minutes.

Mr. Correa: I need only a minute. I am going to resist the temptation to comment on everything that counsel have said with respect to which I could point out inaccuracies or differences of approach. I do want to mention two things.

The Court: I was going to suggest that if anything occurs to you gentlemen, now or after you leave here, that you would like to comment on, I have no objection to receiving a letter. After all, I do want all the aid and assistance I can get. This is a very important question. [fol. 1359] I don't want you to think that I underestimate its importance. And I certainly need all the help I can get to decide it properly, as I see it.

Mr. Correa: That would be most helpful to us, if your Honor please, because in the argument we have had—I don't know how many cases have been referred to, and so forth—but the most interesting thing among the so-called new material is, your Honor asked counsel who spoke last to state as to his agreement or disagreement with Wigmore on grand juries. Curiously enough, he started to answer and before I knew it he was talking about Wigmore on informers' privilege.

Now, I have had occasion in other cases to brief extensively this informers' privilege, and there is a lot of law on informers' privilege, and long sections of Wigmore, and many cases, and it is very interesting. Unfortunately, it has nothing to do with the issue before your Honor. The only thing an informer's privilege covers is the identity of the informer, not even the contents of what he has reported. It is based on a policy encouraging voluntary informing to the Government. Many different considerations apply to it and we could have a fine argument about it. But we would still have our problems unresolved. So I mention that only to point out that it has nothing whatever to do—

The Court: Not even by analogy.
[fol. 1360] Mr. Correa: By analogy, sure, almost anything is related to almost anything else by analogy.

The Court: I believe, if I can read Mr. McDowell's mind, he only brought it out to show that sometimes consideration of public policy far outweighs other considerations. Is that what the idea was?

Mr. McDowell: That's right.

The Court: In other words, you don't throw out the baby with the dirty bath water, is that it? It's the old story again.

Mr. Correa: The one other point which interested me of their argument is this. Counsel for the plaintiff do not disagree, I take it, with the principle enunciated by Wigmore, and by the Rose case, and by the Socony-Vacuum case, and a host of other cases, that where the interests of justice demand it—

The Court: Well, he made it clear that he doesn't think in this case you have shown any cogent reason where the interests of justice demand it. That is what I understood to be their argument.

Mr. Correa: And in what cases would he concede the interests of justice demand it? Well, he said—and I made a note of it—the only cases where grand jury minutes were delivered to the defendant are perjury cases. Now, note the words “to the defendant”, because in those cases there [fol. 1361] was a defendant, in the proper sense. The grand jury had indicted somebody and he was the defendant.

We are not, in respect of this grand jury proceeding, the defendant, or the defendants. There is no defendant in the grand jury proceeding. They didn't indict anybody. That is our point. That is the reason we are here.

Now, counsel says—well, we don't call it an abuse of process; and we apparently concede their process is valid.

We don't. As I said this morning, we prescind from that question. All we say is that if they want to try their civil cases, and prepare their civil cases, by using the grand jury, then that must be made subject to the rules that apply to civil litigation. It rests with their choice. They didn't have to use the grand jury. They don't have to use it ever again in preparation.

The Court: They can't get Congress to give them the power of subpoena to investigate. Did you get it yet?

Mr. McDowell: No.

The Court: Do they still put the bill in every year?

Mr. McDowell: (Nods.)

Mr. Correa: But so long as they want to use the grand jury, then, if your Honor please, it seems to me they have [fol. 1362] to take it subject to the ordinary rules that apply for every litigant.

The Court: I understood your problem.
 General, did you want to say something?
 Mr. Fortas precedes me.

Mr. Royall:

Mr. Fortas: I just have one word, if your Honor will permit me. The Government says the one exception is in perjury cases. Your Honor, the Government is opposed to turning over the transcript of a grand jury's testimony to the defendant, even though it indicted that defendant for perjury in his grand jury testimony.

The Court: They only do it when a judge tells them they have to do it, I realize that. They never want to turn it over. Let's be frank about it. No prosecuting officials ever like to turn over grand jury minutes. They just don't like to do it, because of the sacredness and secrecy of the grand jury. And so it is only with great reluctance that it is done. And I don't say that I quarrel with the public policy of not just lifting the whole thing for everybody to look at. There are many reasons and I know them. I told you I was in the grand jury room for seven years. And I know that big mouths in the grand jury have made life-long enemies for certain people by saying, "You know who told about you?" That started it.

You have to have a lot of secrecy, I can tell you that. [fol. 1363] I learned it the hard way, Mr. Fortas. I had to be very careful for fear someone didn't say, "You know, that Modarelli fixed you when he got through talking to the grand jury." That was a lifelong enemy for Judge Modarelli from then on. If I ever ran for office I guess they would work very hard to see me elected—out the window.

Mr. Fortas: Your Honor, you know when the question first came up about the disclosure of statements made by the F.B.I. the Government said, "If the courts require us to disclose the statements made to the F.B.I., people will clam up. They won't talk to the F.B.I."

The Court: All those dire predictions that are made—if the Court decides otherwise—never come true?

Mr. Fortas: That is my point.

The Court: Never. I am never frightened by that. I can read you a lovely poem about that.

Mr. Fortas: That is my point.

The Court: If I believed all the things that I have heard since I was born about what was going to happen if, so and so, got elected, or this happened, or that happened, I might have committed suicide a long time ago. I don't believe it any more.

Mr. Fortas: Thank you, your Honor.

Mr. Royall: Your Honor, the only reason I arise—and I hope I stick to the subject fairly well—is the remark [fol. 1364] that your Honor made that a witness is supposed to tell the truth every time and you don't see why he needs any refreshment of his recollection, something of that kind.

The Court: I mean the truth about the ultimate fact that he is testifying to. The details are different, I can understand that.

Mr. Royall: Well, I just want to relate this to the Siddall matter, because it is illustrative of what will happen every time we have a witness up.

No one can remember the vast amount of information that has been required in connection, for example, with the search for all these documents. Mr. Siddall was examined about three years ago, three and a half years ago—more than that; about three and a half years ago. He is a man of fine memory, but it would present difficulty to any man to have a detailed recollection. His examination was a detailed examination. There may have been changes in conditions. There may have been additional matters discovered on the search, and therefore it would be quite unjust that he should not have available to him what he said when his recollection was fresh about it.

It seems pretty well established, and the Rose case clearly states, that certainly there can be no harm in a man having his own testimony, no one can be harmed. And he, Mr. Siddall, as well as the company, has asked for [fol. 1365] it. You are familiar with the language in the Rose case.

The Court: Oh, yes.

Mr. Royall: There is no use to give it to you again.

The Court: I have read it enough times and analyzed it.

Mr. Royall: Now, your Honor, it happens that something of that kind has arisen quite a number of times—in the Packers' case; even in the Darling case it arose; and the Rose case, the language there; and the California case—and, therefore, we are confronted with a special reason for those who are to be examined in the case, whether it is on deposition or the trial. And I just wanted to point that out to you in answer to what I took to be an inference that perhaps it was immaterial whether they had their testimony before they were examined about it.

The Court: No, I had in mind certain definite situations that arise where a man, if he is telling the truth, can't tell two stories about it.

Mr. Royall: That's right.

The Court: But certainly a man, a busy man particularly—that includes a busy judge, or a busy lawyer, or a busy business man—cannot be expected to remember countless details in his business. I meet people in the street and they say, "Did you forget that you tried this [fol. 1366] case for me?"

In a little over thirty years at the bar you certainly can't remember every case you tried, no matter how well paid you were.

Many things. People I married say, "You don't remember that you married me?"

"When did I marry you?" "1925."

I married fourteen hundred couples. I can't remember every bride and groom I ever married when I was a magistrate. And they are insulted that I don't remember that I married them.

I realize these things.

Mr. Royall: That is what I was talking about. This is a case of asking him about countless documents, and countless individuals. And when they first had this discovery, back in 1951 and '52, of course he was right up to date on it. He is a very honest man, he is a very conscientious man, but it might make a difference. It puts him on the defensive. If he had that transcript he would certainly be able to refresh his recollection as to what he had said at the time he originally made the search for these documents, which are the same documents under the grand jury, to a large extent, as they were when they came later in the civil action.

I merely wanted to call that to your Honor's attention, [fol. 1367] and in conclusion to repeat this, that I feel that the argument made by the other defendants is eminently sound, that this case was based, this complaint was drawn, necessarily drawn, in large part, if not entirely, upon what they got before the grand jury, because it came right after that, their discovery was based on the grand jury, their statement of contentions and the issues were necessarily—though they are most incomplete and unsatisfactory from our standpoint, what they say there must have been based on the grand jury. Now, they have had those three and a half or four years, some of it nearly five years, and they have had all that time for preparation of this case. Their preparation has been predicated on that. And we say that common fairness entitles us to that information. We are not playing a game, we are not playing ace in the hole—it may be a deuce in the hole they have got, your Honor, instead of an ace; I rather think it is—but whether it is an ace in the hole or a deuce in the hole, we are entitled to know it.

Thank you, sir.

The Court: Well, ordinarily they would agree with you, but they say this is an antitrust suit—pro bono publico to be considered, right?

Mr. McDowell: Your Honor, may I be permitted two short sentences?

[fol. 1368] The Court: Can I fine you if it is more than two, and will you pay it?

Mr. McDowell: I will pay it, your Honor.

If counsel can say with certainty what he has just said, that this case, this civil case, and all its trappings, came out of the grand jury, then counsel doesn't need the transcript of the grand jury, because he already knows too much.

The Court: You mean by knowing that?

Mr. McDowell: If he can say that with certainty. Otherwise he is engaging in speculation.

The Court: He only deduces that, and infers it, from the fact that not long after the grand jury was discharged you filed this complaint. And, you know, jurors send people to the chair on inferences.

Mr. Correa: We also deduce it from the Department's press release, if I may say so, your Honor.

The Court: Gentlemen, I want to thank you all. The briefs were excellent and most helpful. And I really do believe that you all tried to help me to render the right decision, as you see it. And I am conscious of the fact that you all have an enlightened interest in your clients, and it may naturally influence your reasoning, there is no doubt about it.

Off the record.

MODARELLI, District Judge.

A grand jury sitting in this district from May, 1951, until November 25, 1952, investigated possible violations of the anti-trust laws in the soap and synthetic detergent industry. The firms under investigation included the four defendants in this civil action: The Procter & Gamble Company, Colgate-Palmolive Company, Lever Brothers Company, and The Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc. No indictment was returned.

On December 11, 1952, the United States filed its complaint in this action.¹

[fol. 1377] Now before the court are defendants' motions for an order compelling plaintiff to produce and permit the inspection and copying by the defendants of the transcripts of the testimony of all witnesses who appeared before the grand jury.² There are two issues:

(1) Whether the ends of justice require the court to exercise its discretion under Rule 34 to order plaintiff to produce and permit the inspection and copying by the defendants of the transcripts of the testimony of all witnesses who appeared before the grand jury.³ (2) If the ends of justice require production, whether there is any reason for maintaining the secrecy of the transcripts.

The Supreme Court has stated the lofty purpose of discovery which this court has followed⁴ and will continue to follow in approaching its consideration of the first issue:

² Alternative motions are for an order compelling plaintiff to produce the transcripts of those witnesses who consent thereto.

"* * * Mutual knowledge of all the relevant facts gathered by both parties is essential to proper litigation. To that end, either party may compel the other to disgorge whatever facts he has in his possession. The deposition-discovery procedure simply advances the stage at which the disclosure can be compelled from the time of trial to the period preceding it, thus reducing the possibility of surprise. * * *." Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 507 (1947).

[fol. 1378] The very substantial contention of defendants is that plaintiff has used the facts contained in the transcripts to gain an unfair advantage over defendants who have been unable to use these facts in preparing for trial. They argue that justice, as implemented by the broad discovery rules,⁵ entitles them to use these transcripts. As a result of that persuasive contention and because this is a "Big Case"⁶ involving serious, complex, and unique procedural problems, during the oral argument of these motions the court asked Mr. McDowell, plaintiff's attorney, the following questions:

"Mr. McDowell, do you object to submitting a detailed affidavit stating exactly (a) what use, if any, plaintiff has made in the past of the grand jury transcripts while preparing for the trial of this case; (b) what use, if any, plaintiff intends to make of the transcripts during its future preparation for the trial; (c) what use, if any, plaintiff intends to make of the transcripts during the trial." (Transcript, December 12, 1955, pp. 6-7.)

⁴ See the description in the Appendix of the unusual procedure used in this case.

⁶ The label now is synonymous with Sherman Act cases commenced by the United States against multiple defendants. See "The Big Case," 64 Harv. L. Rev. 27 (1950). The magnitude of this case is described in the Appendix.

He wished to confer with his superiors in the Department of Justice before deciding if he would answer the questions. The court awaited candid answers—but in vain. For Mr. McDowell wrote:

"The questions which you put to me at the hearing on December 12th relating to the use by the government of transcripts of grand jury testimony have been given serious consideration within the Department of Justice. I am instructed respectfully to inform you that we do not wish to add to the statement which I made at the hearing."

His "statement" at the hearing did not answer the questions. Because the plaintiff arbitrarily has refused to answer the court's questions relating to any use of these transcripts, the court has been denied helpful information and as a result has been forced to seek its answers elsewhere.

The Department of Justice, plaintiff's representative in the courts, believes that under the law it has the right and duty to use the grand jury to enforce the anti-trust laws through criminal proceedings, civil actions, or both.⁷ This

⁷ See discussion at pp. 3-4 of the appendix. Additional evidence of the Department's interpretation of the law is a statement by the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division of the Department: On May 12, 1955, he appeared before the Special Antitrust Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives; he stated:

"Finally, I suggest you may wish to consider means available to the Department for compelling production of data before a complaint has been filed in a civil procedure. At the present time in the investigation of civil matters, the Department must

"(a) depend upon the voluntary cooperation of those under investigation;

"(b) file a civil complaint and make use of discovery processes under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure; or

"(c) make use of the grand jury.

"Those are alternatives.

"From this it seems clear that the sole means for com-

[fol. 1380] is plaintiff's policy, and although its legality is not now in issue, was it followed during the grand jury investigation of these defendants?⁸ On the day the complaint was filed, the Department issued its usual press release, which included the news that "The filing of the complaint results from a careful and thorough investigation of the industry, including extensive grand jury proceedings." There was a basis for that statement. An affidavit filed by Mr. McDowell in support of certain omnibus motions under Rule 34⁹ indicates that the plaintiff considered its motions as requests for supplementary discovery to add to information previously obtained both from documents pulling pre-complaint data in civil cases is the grand jury. Some—and I refer to lawyers there primarily—have urged that such use of the grand jury constitutes an abuse of its processes.

"Mr. Maletz. Do you agree with that position, Judge?

"Mr. Barnes. I do not.

"The Chairman. I am glad to hear you say that.

"Mr. Harkins. In that connection, under the Sherman Act, you can use a grand jury to get evidence solely for a Section 4 injunction proceeding, can you not? There is no abuse of using the court's process to convene a grand jury to secure evidence for you solely in a Section 4 proceeding?

"Mr. Barnes. No, I do not think there is any abuse of it."

(The colloquy appears in Colgate's Brief, pp. 13-14; its source is the transcript published by the Bureau of National Affairs, Inc., at p. 350.)

⁸ If the policy was followed, it is reasonable to conclude that plaintiff has used and will continue to use the transcripts during its preparation for trial; the only other conclusion would be that plaintiff has adopted a useless policy. Furthermore, would plaintiff so vigorously have argued the legality of its multiple use of the grand jury unless in this case it had used the transcripts?

⁹ See discussion in the Appendix beginning at p. 7.

and testimony during the grand jury proceedings. Additionally, a previous opinion in this case is pertinent:

" * * * Government's counsel stated in affidavit form that the purposes of the investigation were, first, determination whether there were violations of Sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Sherman Act or any of them, or of any other Federal anti-trust laws, and, second, determination as to what action should be taken to enforce those laws through criminal proceedings, civil proceedings or both. He further stated that the investigation and all proceedings incident to it, including the grand jury proceeding, were begun and carried on pursuant to and within instructions to accomplish those purposes. * * * " United States v. Procter & Gamble, et al., 14 F.R.D. 230, 233 (D.C. N.J. 1953).

The evidence before the grand jury, of course, consisted both of documents and testimony, whereas the motions now before the court relate only to the testimony. But none of [fol. 1381] the evidence as to plaintiff's policy and use of the transcripts indicates that plaintiff is disregarding grand jury testimony.

The court is not completely informed about plaintiff's use of the transcripts, however, because plaintiff's silence as to the extent of its use is not overcome by any evidence similar to that which has enabled the court to decide that plaintiff has used and will continue to use the transcripts during its preparation for trial. As to what use plaintiff plans for the transcripts during the trial itself—subject to the law of evidence—although the court once again is confronted by the lack of answers to its questions, since the case only is in its discovery stage the issues involved are not now before the court.¹⁰

The fact that plaintiff has used and will continue to use the transcripts while preparing for trial is perhaps sufficient reason why the ends of justice require production of the transcripts for defendants' use. But equally important is the extent to which defendants will be aided by such production. The testimony contained in the transcripts is unknown to the court. But plaintiff has never contended it is irrelevant to the issues in this case. Indeed, such a contention would be disingenuous in view of the fact of plaintiff's use of the transcripts. Any relevant information, not privileged, which is the scope of the pretrial discovery mechanism established by Rules 26 to 37, has " * * * [fol. 1382] a vital role in the preparation for trial. The various instruments of discovery now serve (1) as a device, along with the pre-trial hearing under Rule 16, to narrow and clarify the basic issues between the parties, and (2) as a device for ascertaining the facts, or information as to the existence or whereabouts of facts, relative to those issues. Thus civil trials in the federal courts no longer need be carried on in the dark. The way is now clear, consistent with recognized privileges, for the parties to obtain the fullest possible knowledge of the issues and facts before trial." Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 501 (1947). Thus, the transcripts would be useful to defendants during their preparation for trial.

Clearly, the ends of justice will be attained by plaintiff's disclosure of the grand jury testimony, and defendants have shown good cause for the production of the transcripts. But, plaintiff argues, if defendants inspect and copy the transcripts, it would violate their traditional secrecy.

Any discussion relating to the secrecy of grand jury transcripts begins with United States v. Rose, 215 F. 2d 617 (CA 3, 1954). There the court summarized, at page 628, the reasons generally given for the rule of secrecy:

" * * * (1) To prevent the escape of those whose indictment may be contemplated; (2) to insure the utmost freedom to the grand jury in its deliberations, and to prevent persons subject to indictment or their friends from importuning the grand jurors; (3) to prevent subornation of perjury or tampering with the witnesses who may testify before grand jury and later appear at the trial of those indicted by it; (4) to encourage free and untrammelled disclosures by persons who have information with respect to the commission of crimes; (5) to protect innocent accused who is exonerated from disclosure of the fact that he has been under investigation, and from the expense of standing trial where there was no probability of guilt."

[fol. 1383] Do any of those reasons apply in this case? The grand jury having been discharged without returning an indictment, (1) and (2) clearly do not apply; (5) also is not applicable for the very corporations who were being investigated have moved for production of the transcripts. As to (3), the court agrees with Judge Hartshorne's opinion in United States v. Grunstein, supra, at p. 201:

"* * * this same reason applies to every possible witness known to one party in a civil proceeding, whose name is desired by the other, a form of discovery clearly requisite. For the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure are based on the conclusion, that this possibility is not as great a danger as is the danger of surprise, which habitually resulted previously, when such discovery was generally refused. That this conclusion is sound, is fortified by the fact that the party who already knows of this witness can, by these very same discovery rules, see that this witness' story is not tampered with, by having his depositions taken and sworn to, before he is subjected to any such possible pressure from the other side."

As to (4), United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., supra, United States v. Grunstein, supra, and 8 Wigmore, Evidence, § 2362 (3d ed. 1940) are persuasive authorities that after the grand jury has been discharged, the temporary guarantee of secrecy ends and disclosure is proper. If the rule were otherwise, it would create an opportunity for abuse by a corrupt witness who could testify falsely without fear of his lies being revealed to public scrutiny and reaction.

Thus, none of the reasons for secrecy of the transcripts applies in this case.

The court indicated during the oral argument that the many criminal cases cited by plaintiff which involved special circumstances for maintaining secrecy properly were distinguishable from this case. Subsequently, United States v. Grunstein, supra, was decided, wherein the court also distinguished the cases where the defendant's sought production [fol. 1384] of the transcripts in order to attack the validity of the indictment.¹¹ The defendants in this civil action seek the transcripts for discovery purposes.

Judge Learned Hand's remark in United States v. Garsson, 291 Fed. 646, 649 (S.D. N.Y. 1923) is often quoted:

"* * * no judge of this court has granted it [motion for inspection of the grand jury minutes] and I hope none ever will. * * *"

It was a criminal case in which defendants moved to quash the indictment and at the same time they moved to inspect the grand jury minutes. In his opinion, Judge Hand first denied the motion to quash, then he denied the motion to inspect. The full text of the portion of the opinion relating to the motion to inspect clearly shows that his remark cannot be applied in this case.¹² United States v. Henry S.

¹¹ Shushan v. United States, 117 F. 2d 110 (CA 5 1941); United States v. Papaioannu, 10 F.R.D. 517 (D.C. Del 1950); United States v. Oley, 21 F. Supp. 281 (E.D. N.Y. 1937); United States v. Herzig, 26 F. 2d 487 (S.D. N.Y. 1928); United States v. Morse, 292 Fed. 273 (S.D. N.Y. 1922); United States v. Silverthorne, 265 Fed. 853 (W.D. N.Y. 1920); United States v. Gouled, 253 Fed. 242 (S.D. N.Y. 1918); United States v. Rubin, 214 Fed. 507 (D.C. Conn. 1914); United States v. Violon, 173 Fed. 501 (C.C. S.D. N.Y. 1909).

¹² "Finally, the defendants, recognizing that it is difficult to make a case for quashal by the scraps of evidence accessible, move for inspection of the grand jury's minutes. I am no more disposed to grant it than I was in 1909. U. S. v. Violon (C.C.) 173 Fed. 501. It is said to lie in discretion; and perhaps it does, but no judge of this court has granted it, and I hope none ever will. Under our criminal procedure the accused has every advantage. While the prosecution is

[Vol. 1385] Morgan, et al, Civil Action No. 43-757, S.D. N.Y., also is not persuasive authority for there was no opinion setting forth the court's reasons for denying the defendants' motion for production of the grand jury transcripts; moreover, the court in that case orally admitted that perhaps " * * * I have been unduly affected by that statement of Judge Learned Hand. * * *"¹³

In United States v. General Motors Corp., 15 F.R.D. 486, 487, 488 (D.C. Del. 1954), the court denied the defendant's motion under Rule 34 for production of the grand jury transcripts. The court having found no reported case in which a defendant requested in a civil action production of the transcripts under Rule 34, it decided the question " * * * on general principles of long standing, designed to protect and preserve the efficacy of our Grand Jury system." One of the general principles which the court relied upon was that although discovery under the Rules is of extensive scope, it " * * * must be halted when it attempts to invade ground reserved for loftier reasons than thoroughness of preparing one's case on the civil side of the court. * * *." The court decided that protection of the grand jury process was a loftier reason: " * * * The effect on subsequent proceedings, on jurors, on witnesses, on the privacy of the system itself, is of greater moment * * *."

held rigidly to the charge, he need not disclose the barest outline of his defense. He is immune from question or comment on his silence; he cannot be convicted when there is the least fair doubt in the minds of any one of the twelve. Why in addition he should in advance have the whole evidence against him to pick over at his leisure, and make his defense, fairly or foully, I have never been able to see. No doubt grand juries err and indictments are calamities to honest men; but we must work with human beings and we can correct such errors only at too large a price. Our dangers do not lie in too little tenderness to the accused. Our procedure has been always haunted by the ghost of the innocent man convicted. It is an unreal dream. What we need to fear is the archaic formalism and the watery sentiment that obstructs, delays, and defeats the prosecution of crime."

This court will not follow that decision, and for two reasons, viz., the opinion does not indicate that the court considered whether plaintiff used the grand jury transcripts in connection with the civil action; and that court mainly relied upon criminal cases where in the refusal to order production of the transcripts was for reasons not present in this case.

[fol. 1386] The question to be resolved here by the court presents an unprecedented vexing problem, since practically all cases dealing with the subject matter concern cases decided under Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Here, the applications to inspect and copy the grand jury transcripts are brought under the discovery provisions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. I realize there is a strong caveat against the needless intrusion upon the indispensable secrecy of grand jury proceedings. The reasons therefor were indelibly impressed upon me when I served as Assistant Prosecutor of my home county for ten years where I spent the greater part of the time presenting cases to the grand jury. I realize further that a strong and positive showing should be required of persons seeking to break the seal of secrecy, which never should be done except in extreme instances to prevent clear injustice or an abuse of judicial processes. Which policy should be served here to bring about justice—the policy requiring secrecy, or the policy permitting disclosure for discovery purposes only in the interest of justice? I believe the requirement of secrecy in this case can be safely waived and the minutes of the grand jury divulged within the limits prescribed by the law, and that the failure to do so would be an abuse of discretion and not in the furtherance of justice. Under Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure our courts have, by way of interpretation, extended their jurisdiction so as to remove “the veil of secrecy” around grand jury proceedings where, in the court’s discretion, the furtherance of justice requires it. If it can be done on the criminal side, I can see no compelling reason why it cannot be safely done on the civil side in this case. I would not grant these motions if I thought they were prejudicial to the public interest, useless or unnecessary, would not reveal the information sought, or defendants already possessed all the necessary information or could [fol. 1387] obtain it by pursuing a different remedy. These motions were considered by me objectively and honestly by setting aside all my preconceived ideas on the subject.

The court concludes that since plaintiff is using the transcripts containing relevant information, the ends of justice require the court to order plaintiff to produce and permit the inspection and copying by defendants of the transcripts; equal use of the transcripts by defendants will give them the fullest possible knowledge of the facts before trial; none of the reasons for the rule of secrecy applies.

An order may be submitted in conformity with the opinion herein expressed.

APPENDIX

In its opinion granting the defendant's motions to compel the plaintiff to produce the grand jury transcripts, the court referred to the serious, complex, and unique procedural problems involved in this case. A discussion of those problems will show their relationship to defendants' motions as well as explain the references in the opinion to other phases of this case. Also, judges and lawyers who in future years will be involved in protracted anti-trust cases—a "Big Case"—will be aided by a description of the unusual procedure successfully used in this case during the normally gruelling Battle for Documents.

When the plaintiff filed three omnibus motions under Rule 34, designating by category descriptions the types of documents sought from the three manufacturing defendants, the court studied the lengthy descriptions. It would have been impossible to decide intelligently the issue, viz., whether plaintiff's assertion of "good cause" for the production of the documents was outweighed by defendants' assertion that additional production would force them to undergo an unreasonably disruptive and expensive file search. The court also was greatly concerned about plaintiff's failure to reveal sufficient relevant facts which it had discovered from defendants' earlier production of documents. By suggesting a procedure the court hopefully anticipated that if plaintiff would reveal its facts, defendants would consent to produce some documents, thereby limiting plaintiff's requests for documents in a greatly modified substitute motion. Happily, to date it appears that plaintiff's motions are or will be entirely necessary.¹

A detailed discussion of most of the litigation events which have occurred in this case is required to understand counsel's arguments as well as the court's solution of the serious and recurrent problem concerning the production of documents in a protracted anti-trust case.

March 6, 1953, plaintiff filed the first motion. It was for an order requiring defendant Procter to produce documents under Rule 34, " * * * and permit the plaintiff to inspect and remove from the custody of the Clerk for the purpose of copying * * * certain documents identified by numbers affixed thereto by defendant, such numbers being listed in Exhibit 'A' attached thereto. * * * " The documents were designated by numbers assigned by Procter prior to the production of the same documents in compliance with three grand jury subpoenas.² Since the documents [fol. 1390] had been returned to Procter, plaintiff's motion was a necessary procedural move. In opposition to the motion, Procter's principal arguments were that plaintiff failed to show the good cause required by Rule 34, and that plaintiff had abused the process of this court. The substance of the first argument was that " * * * since plaintiff has had possession of the great bulk of Procter documents now asked for a year and a half and has made copies and notes, though improperly, of selected papers, it would seem obvious that plaintiff is already in possession of the information sought and has no cause for production under Rule 34." As to the second argument, " * * * the Government abused the process of the Court by using criminal subpoenas before a Grand Jury in order to prepare for this civil action. * * * Accordingly, this Court should redress the wrongs done to Procter by reason of the abuse described and, by dismissing this motion, should see to it that the Department of Justice in this case and in future cases will take no benefit at all from misusing the Grand Jury process."³ A further argument was that since proceedings before the grand jury are ex parte, the effect of plaintiff's conduct is that in this civil case plaintiff has obtained ex parte discovery contrary to the mutuality nature of the pretrial discovery rules. In support of its motion to produce documents, plaintiff argued that " * * * Defendant cannot say that the documents which it was ordered to produce [by Judge Forman during the grand jury investigation] because of their relevance to the descriptions of violations made in the argument [before Judge Forman] are not equally relevant to the allegations.

² Two subpoenas were served in May, 1951, and one in June, 1952. Motions to quash the former were extensively argued before Judge Hofman, who modified their scope.

of the complaint. Neither can it say that documents which [fol. 1291] were needed to determine the existence of such possible violations are not now needed to establish the allegations in the complaint." As to Procter's argument regarding the misuse of the grand jury process, according to plaintiff " * * * the investigation [grand jury] was begun and carried on with both criminal enforcement and civil enforcement in mind. The purposes of the investigation were, first, determination whether there were violations of Sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Sherman Act or any of them, or of any other Federal antitrust laws, and, second, determination as to what action should be taken to enforce those laws through criminal proceedings, civil proceedings or both. * * * Because the Sherman Act's Section 4 by virtue of which civil actions may be brought, is an ancillary section, dependent, as Judge Carpenter stated * * * [United States v. Swift, 188 Fed. 92, 196 (D.C. Ill. 1911)] upon the criminal sections, it is difficult to see how any investigation could ever be begun with the sole purpose of bringing a civil case."⁴ Plaintiff believed that a Section 4 action could not be commenced until a determination had been made that there had been a violation of the criminal sections, that whatever other action is taken by the Department of Justice, the preliminary determination must be that there has been a violation of the criminal sections of the Sherman Act.⁵

May 11, 1953, this court filed its opinion granting the [fol. 1392] motion, United States v. Procter & Gamble, et al, 14 F.R.D. 230, deciding that plaintiff properly sought production of the documents " * * * anew in this cause to avoid the objections voiced by defendant's attorney, rather than depend upon previous possession in the criminal action."⁶ As to the abuse of process argument, this court was unwilling " * * * to criticize this procedure [the multiple purpose—criminal, civil, or both—use of the grand jury] by a refusal to allow production of the documents requested." As a result of the skirmish between plaintiff and Procter culminating in this court's order to produce the documents, on plaintiff's application on July 14, 1953, this court also ordered the other three defendants to produce certain enumerated and described documents " * * * the United States desiring these documents [the same as those produced before the grand jury] for use in the present action as though they had been produced by Lever [and Colgate and The Association] pursuant to motion and order under Rule 34 * * *." On the same day there was a stipulation for inspection and copying by defendants of certain "third person" documents. The defendants had sought permission from plaintiff to inspect and copy documents possessed by plaintiff's attorneys for use in trial preparation and which were obtained from and were records of persons, firms or corporations who are not parties in this action ("third persons"); the stipulation resulted when thirty-seven of the third persons did not object to defendants' inspecting and copying the documents.

⁴ Plaintiff also argued that since the dependency of § 4 upon §§ 1, 2 and 3 requires a determination as to whether there has been a criminal violation before a civil action can be commenced under § 4, it would not be an abuse of process to undertake grand jury proceedings with the sole purpose of preparing for a civil case under § 4.

June 4, 1953, Procter filed two motions: For the "Return of Copies and Other Writings"⁷ and to "Suppress [fol. 1393] certain Documents."⁸ One of Procter's two principal contentions in support of its first motion was its previous contention relating to the abuse of grand jury process. Procter also contended that " * * * Judge Forgan, during the hearings on the motions to quash the said subpoenas duces tecum, ruled that the documents to be submitted should be retained in rooms provided in the Federal Building, Newark, New Jersey, and counsel for the Government acquiesced. Nevertheless, in violation of this ruling, as we contend, counsel for the Government caused copies and notes, etc., of certain of the said documents to be made and to be taken to Washington, D. C., where they would normally have been handled or seen by persons not directly concerned with the Grand Jury proceedings." ⁹ Procter's contentions in support of its second motion included all of its previously discussed arguments regarding plaintiff's motion for the production of documents. ¹⁰

⁷ Copies of the documents; excerpts from and all notes, analyses, summaries and other writings concerning the documents.

⁸ (1) Documents submitted by Procter to the grand jury and listed in plaintiff's motion dated March 6, 1953; (2) copies of, excerpts from and all notes, analyses, summaries

January 14, 1954, this court denied Procter's two motions. Absent any authority, the court was reluctant to erect an " * * * insurmountable obstacle to any civil and other writings concerning any of the documents; papers, documents and other like evidence obtained directly or indirectly by reason of information or knowledge derived wholly or partially from (1) and (2). Procter also included in the motion any documents, etc., obtained by plaintiff during the grand jury proceedings from any of the other defendants, and any documents, etc., obtained from any source other than defendants.

¹⁰ The only effective remedy, argued Procter, for plaintiff's conduct is to prohibit plaintiff's use of the documents. Plaintiff again argued: " * * * Section 4 of the Sherman Act, the section under which the instant civil action was brought, is simply an ancillary provision to Sections 1, 2 and 3 which establish and define crimes. The civil action may be brought only 'to prevent and restrain violations' of the Act's criminal provisions. (15 U.S.C.A. § 4).

[fol. 1394] action * * *, which probably would have resulted if the motion had been granted.¹¹

August 23, 1954, plaintiff filed the three omnibus motions under Rule 34 for production of documents by the three manufacturing defendants, and on September 24, 1954, amendments were filed. Two of the three motions were eleven pages in length, one was ten pages. For example, plaintiff demanded the following categories of documents from Procter: Profit and loss statements and balance sheets; records or work books showing monthly estimates of departmental expenses and profits and losses; published price lists; sales records; records or work books showing prices, various costs and profits; market surveys, charts, tables and schedules, memoranda and correspondence showing production, sales, purchases, promotional expenditures, inventories, prices, costs, profits; licences, sub-licences or other contracts concerning patents; memoranda or correspondence relating to certain patents, negotiations for the procurement of certain materials, construction of facilities by the supplier of certain materials, processing of certain materials; with respect to the production of 11 * * * the proper remedy is not the granting of this type of motion, which would probably result in an insurmountable obstacle to any civil action, but by a direct attack at the outset of the criminal investigation. Indirect deterrence does not outweigh enforcement of the anti-trust laws. If the court were to grant these motions, would it not, in effect, forever bar a civil action? And would not the principle of law be that where documents are produced by a party pursuant to a subpoena duces tecum for consideration by a grand jury and thereafter the documents returned, no indictment having been found, as was the case here, and subsequently a civil action is commenced by the United States against the same party and the same documents are produced pursuant to Rule 34, that nevertheless the United States must deliver to that party its 'work product' based on the documents and all evidence therefrom must be suppressed. There is no authority or precedent for such a proposition, nor does this court believe that should be the law." (The opinion has not been published.)

[fol. 1395] synthetic detergents, production schedules and estimates, analyses and estimates of base material requirements, sales estimates, and plans, and all memoranda and correspondence relating thereto; contracts with sellers of certain products, memoranda and correspondence relating to price changes and other price data; market surveys, tabulations, memoranda and correspondence relating to shelf prices charged by retailers; records and contracts relating to purchases of tallow or grease during certain periods; memoranda and correspondence relating to purchases of tallow or grease; memoranda and correspondence relating to the termination of the "official New York market price" for tallow or grease, and to the criteria in determining their price; tri-party contract establishing brand quotas or other limitations on advertising and promotional expenses entered into by Procter, Colgate, and Lever in or about January 1938, and all reports, memoranda and correspondence relating thereto; records showing total advertising expenditures and brands sales promotion for each brand; sales division expenses records; memoranda and correspondence relating to the discontinuance or limitation by the three manufacturing defendants and/or any other manufacturer of 1c or other special sales, special factory packs, premiums, or special advertising allowances; competitive activity reports; promotional records of various sales units market surveys, tabulations, charts, memoranda and correspondence relating to the planning and conduct of certain promotional couponing campaigns; records showing sales by product categories as reported to the defendant Association; records showing sales and shipments by product categories as submitted to the Bureau of Census of the United States Department of Commerce; records showing sales by brands; records showing sales of various products by dollar amounts; records showing sales of glycerine; memoranda, correspondence, and reports relating to comparative washing tests and detergent evaluations of any brands of other companies; memoranda and [fol. 1396] correspondence relating to negotiations for the purchase of rights to the product "Glim" from the General Aniline & Film Corporation.

Defendants' lengthy briefs and affidavits in opposition to the three motions greatly interested the court in the procedural problems of a "Big Case."¹² The court's research and its own ideas resulted in a suggested procedure which was read to counsel during the oral argument:

"Of course, I am happy to note that both sides agree with my opening remarks in an attempt to focus the problem of revealing more specifically the facts upon which the Government bases its case.¹³ I have some suggestions. If you will bear with me, it may be productive of some good. I hope it will be. So far we have gotten off to a pretty good start and there is indication of a spirit of cooperation.

"Now, I have a suggested manner of procedure. I thought I would give it to you before lunchtime so you gentlemen can think it over and see whether or not you think this is as good as I think it is. I will concede [fol. 1397] that many of you attorneys in this case know more about antitrust litigation than the Court will ever know.

¹² For example, Mr. Siddall of Procter swore that his company already had produced twenty-two full filing cabinet drawers, containing in excess of 50,000 pieces of paper, books, and other corporate records; he estimated that thus far the cost involved in the search of files exceeded $175,000, exclusive of all legal expenses and that the search would require the full or part time services of more than 100 employees of the company for a substantial period of time and the direct and indirect expense to the company, apart from the interference with the normal conduct of its business, would be $60,000. Mr. Pollock of Colgate swore that production of documents under six paragraphs alone would exceed the total production of 45,000 pages under the three grand jury subpoenas. Mr. Kissner of Lever swore that the motion, if granted, would require Lever to examine 200 file drawers and 1,200,000 papers, and two paragraphs of the motion would require it to produce 300,000 documents.

¹³ The court's opening remarks were, in part, prompted by Judge Prettyman's comments at the Symposium of the New York State Bar Association Section on Antitrust Law, held on January 24, 1951:

"... a trial is for the determination of issues; issues are disputes; a dispute must concern a known subject; to be justiciable, the positions of the parties upon the subject must be known; to be persuasive, evidence must be understandable and definitive."

"I will, of course, limit discovery to documents which are relevant to the issues in the case. That's difficult because we don't have the issues yet.

"The pleadings have not particularized the issue. Thus it is the job of the Court and counsel to do it as soon as possible.

"The parties should agree upon a statement of the issues, but if that is impossible they may submit to the Court their proposed statements, which will always be subject to any necessary amendments.

"When the issues have been defined, the plaintiff, in accordance with Mr. Barnes' promise, should relate to the issues and specify the documents it intends to rely upon to prove those issues.

"As to the period of time for which discovery will be allowed at this time, no document relating to conduct later than December 11, 1952, I believe, should be produced—December 11, 1952.¹⁴ Any conduct of the defendants subsequent to that date, on which the complaint was filed, may be relevant to the problem of the remedy. If the defendants are liable, but such post-complaint conduct is not relevant to the liability phase of this case, in the Court's opinion.

"Plaintiff has complained of an alleged condition existing prior to that date, a combination-conspiracy-monopolizing brought about by an alleged course of conduct occurring prior to that date. By its very contents a complaint of this sort looks to the past, complains of the past, and says because of the past, laws have been violated.

"Since the complaint alleges a conspiracy and a monopolization, however, as a matter of substantive law at the trial it may be necessary for the court to consider the impact of the defendants' conduct upon actual or potential competition. And if that is the case, perhaps evidence of competitive activity, or the lack of it, would be significant. 65 Harvard Law Review, 1079. "As to plaintiff's desire to search into antiquity, since plaintiff has alleged that defendants have formed a combination and conspiracy, proof of it is, of course, [fol. 1398] essential to the plaintiff's case, so that documents, however ancient, relating to the alleged formation, are properly within the scope of the case. The rub here, however, is in the breadth of the word 'relating', which always causes a great deal of trouble, there being no document labeled 'Combination and Conspiracy Agreement.' But conduct alleged to have been pursuant to the alleged combination and conspiracy may have occurred so many years ago that proof of it will not aid the Court in deciding whether or not any unlawful results have occurred. The distinction here is between evidence of conspiracy and evidence of conspiratorial conduct, the latter presenting the familiar quantitative problems of cumulative evidence and bulk, which counsel must earnestly strive to limit, both for the benefit of the Court and their clients.

"The test for each category of documents sought is, of course, relevancy. But in this case we should add the words 'and necessity.' Plaintiff must show not only that it needs the documents for purposes of its trial preparation, but also that it needs them at this time. Has plaintiff completed its analysis of documents previously produced?

"Furthermore, it appears that at least one discovery order has not yet been fully complied with. According to the brief of Lever Brothers, 'The parties have been and currently are engaged in carrying out' a discovery order entered on July 14, 1953, pursuant to which Lever Brothers transmitted documents to the plaintiff as late as September 28, 1954. Since documents were produced only two weeks ago, plaintiff must show not only that the documents designated in the current motion are relevant to the issues, but are needed at this time by the plaintiff's attorneys. Is their work schedule so arranged that they will be able to examine these documents at this time or in the foreseeable future?

“The Court hereby sets forth some ideas for keeping this case within reasonable, workable bounds, if that can be done in an antitrust case: (1) It is absolutely necessary to eliminate from plaintiff's discovery efforts any documents which are cumulative, repetitive, and in the nature of housekeeping papers. (2) One method by which the volume of documents might be reduced would be for the defendants to produce samples or statistics for representative years, then after analysis, plaintiff, if it desired to rely upon those samplings, would stipulate with defendants that it is a sample which is representative, if, in fact, such is the case. Or the Court could order production of the sampled documents upon plaintiff's showing of necessity. (3) In order to create issues of fact, obviously plaintiff must reveal more facts. For example, the complaint alleges that defendants have attained, maintained, augmented, and exploited “dominance over [fol. 1399] all other purchasing and selling principal materials used in the production of synthetic detergents. To such allegations of conclusions we must apply questions—How, when and by whom was it done? How did defendants achieve their alleged dominance? ‘By mergers and acquisitions,’ alleges the plaintiff. To which may be asked the question: When and by whom? ‘Or plaintiff alleges, ‘It was done by controlling, fixing, regulating and manipulating prices, terms and conditions of sales, and promotional activities,’ as to which the natural question might be: How? Plaintiff alleges, ‘By exchanging information.’ But it may be asked: When?

“Frankly, plaintiff should state the evidence upon which it intends to rely. Perhaps this could be done by answers to interrogatories pursuant to Rule 33 * * *

“(4) The parties should enter into stipulations as to undisputed facts or facts not subject to justifiable dispute. Rule 36 pertaining to admissions might be usefully employed here.

“(5) Defendants might produce summaries of documents, keeping the originals readily accessible upon demand.

(Transcript, pp. 41-46.)

Plaintiff not only “* * * welcome[d] your Honor’s indication that you do not consider the material relating to the post-complaint matters as being relevant to these issues. I think that in itself will help a great deal.” but also stated that it was willing to modify its lengthy motions.¹⁵ Since the court’s many oral suggestions required careful analysis by and conferences among all counsel, there was an adjournment of further argument on plaintiff’s three motions.

October 22, 1954; the court in a letter to counsel made suggestions to guide them for the next hearing:

[fol. 1400] “Plaintiff requires documents to properly prepare its case. Since plaintiff’s motion for discovery under Rule 34 is before the court, the designation of documents therein will be our guidepost. I was persuaded during plaintiff’s argument at the hearing on October 14, 1954, of the great physical and financial burden to the defendants involved in producing the requested documents, so that now we should concentrate on the significance of the documents. There should be a showing by the plaintiff that its work schedule will enable its attorneys to use the documents, especially since it appears that some documents are currently being produced pursuant to prior discovery orders and agreements, which have not been examined yet by the plaintiff.

“Prior to hearing argument on the motion, the court will hear counsel on the following matters:

“1. A proposed modus operandi worked out by both sides, including a tentative time-table for production of documents and for pretrial conferences.

¹⁵ Properly, counsel for Lever was greatly disturbed at such an indication of plaintiff’s “undigested requests” for documents. (Transcript, p. 56.)

"2. Can counsel agree upon a statement of the issues?

"3. It appears that when plaintiff is ready to reveal more facts upon which it will rely, then defendants will not object to producing documents pertaining thereto. At this time, is it unreasonable to ask plaintiff what facts it has determined from the many documents already produced? Is the case ripe for a statement of facts by plaintiff? If not, when?

"4. Since plaintiff welcomed the court's discovery limitation (transcript p. 52) and said that it will voluntarily withdraw and limit certain portions of its motion, is it prepared to do so? If so, how?

"5. If counsel have not agreed as to the cut-off date limiting plaintiff's period of inquiry, I shall hear argument thereupon.

"6. Assuming plaintiff does not seek 'housekeeping' documents, plaintiff should define the word.

"7. Have counsel agreed to the production of sample documents, statistics, and summaries?

"8. Have counsel agreed whether documents relating to industrial products are relevant?

"9. Are not the words 'relating,' 'concerning,' 'referring to,' 'showing,' which are used throughout the motion papers properly subject to at least two interpretations, viz., the document is sought if (a) within its four corners it evidences the designated subject, or (b) there is a relationship between the document and the designated subject. Which interpretation is intended by plaintiff?

[fol. 1401] "10. Have counsel entered into any stipulations of fact?

"While I encourage counsel to take positions on many points, no one should fear that subsequently he will not be permitted to modify them. In our 'Big Case' there will be no arbitrary rules binding the parties to any positions taken up to keep the case in manageable shape.

"Finally, defendants have emphasized their need for plaintiff to reveal the documents and facts upon which it will rely, relating them to the issues. The argument appears valid in that unnecessary trial adjournments on the grounds of surprise might thereby be avoided.

But do the defendants need such information at this stage of the case? If and when the need is shown, will plaintiff be ready to comply?"

The hearing was set for December 7, 1954. Meantime, all counsel had conferred five times and had submitted reports to the court. As a result, the court was able to determine the remaining areas of contention regarding the still pending plaintiff's motions for the production of documents. Again, the court's opening oral remarks at the hearing describe its approach:

"Now, at the outset I should like to commend and thank counsel who have submitted to the Court their reports of the five meetings held since the October 14, 1954 hearing in this courtroom. While there is no verbatim transcript, after reading the reports the Court has been able to determine some of the areas of contention and differences of opinion.

"Also, I am extremely pleased that five meetings have been held. Although all problems have not been solved, which was my fervent hope, I believe that we are on our way toward keeping this case in manageable shape. While you have not agreed on voluntary production—except that defendants will bring up to the date of the complaint the documents of the same description previously produced—I believe that plaintiff has more specifically revealed some of the ultimate facts upon which it bases its case. Of course, you may disagree with me on that statement.

"Prior to hearing counsel on the motion, in order that you might direct your arguments toward the problems which I perceive now to be before us, I should like to comment further.

"1. Defendants contend that plaintiff should reveal more facts which it has ascertained from its examinations of documents previously produced.

[fol. 1402] "Several times in their reports counsel for Lever and Procter state that plaintiff concedes that it has facts and that defendants are entitled to them substantially in advance of trial, but that at this time the plaintiff will not reveal these facts. This really goes to the crux of the motion, I believe, now before the Court because I believe that as more facts are revealed to the defendants they will voluntarily produce documents relating thereto.

"I am convinced of that. I don't know whether the Government is, but I am.

"Thus Item 3 in the Court's letter to counsel dated October 22, 1954, is the starting point for today's argument. 'At this time is it unreasonably to ask plaintiff what facts it has determined from the many documents already produced? Is the case ripe for a statement of facts by the plaintiff? If not, when?'

"One of my concerns is that since plaintiff has been preparing its case for probably three years, or longer, how long must we wait for defendants to prepare their case? The sooner defendants are informed of plaintiff's factual contentions, the sooner defense preparation can commence—and not before, obviously.

"The 'Tentative Statements of Issues of Fact' submitted by the plaintiff contain some revelations of fact which will aid us on this motion; but as to the general statements therein, perhaps defendants should use interrogatories under Rule 33, which provides that when questions are propounded by a party, it 'shall furnish such information as is available to the party.'

"I want plaintiff's counsel to tell me (1) Does plaintiff now have unrevealed facts? (2) If it does, what objection is there to revealing them to the defendants at this time? And if plaintiff does have unrevealed facts, why doesn't it use Rule 36 pertaining to admissions, then perhaps certain issues of fact will be eliminated from the case, thereby eliminating the need for the production of documents relating thereto.

"2. Are the 'Tentative Statements of Issues of Fact' sufficiently specific to enable Court and counsel to determine the need for the production of additional documents and to enable defendants to prepare their defense?

"I have found twelve statements that appear to meet the 'how, when, and by whom test.' In the Statement re Advertising and Promotions, paragraph I-B-1 states low—agreement; when—1937; by whom—manufacturing defendants; and what—limitations on advertising and promotional expenditures for established brands.

[fol. 1403] “So, as to that statement, while preparing their case, defendants know that the plaintiff will offer evidence to prove that in 1937 the manufacturing defendants entered into an agreement imposing limitations on their advertising and promotional expenditures for their established brands; and, secondly, any documents which evidence such an alleged agreement are arelevant subject in a discovery motion.

“Also in the Statement re Advertising and Promotions, paragraph I-B-2 appears to be sufficiently specific for our twofold purpose as do paragraphs II-B-1, II-B-3 and II-B-4 in the same Statement.

“Now, in the statement re Glycerine, the following paragraphs appear to be sufficiently specific: I-A-2, I-B-1, I-B-2 and I-B-3.

“And in the Statement re Tallow and Grease, paragraphs I-B-2, I-B-3 and I-B-4 appear to meet our test and purpose.

“An example of the importance for plaintiff to reveal facts is shown by comparing its Statement re Advertising and Promotions, paragraph I-B-1, with the sole allegation in the complaint relating to the fact of limitations on expenditures, which is on page twelve of the complaint, Item 7, ‘By controlling, manipulating and fixing amounts which they expend for promotions and advertising.’

“Compare that statement with the new statement, ‘In 1937 the manufacturing defendants reached an agreement imposing limitations on their advertising and promotional expenditures for their established brands.’

“From the latter we now know two factual contentions—(1) agreement, (2) 1937—which were not revealed in the complaint.

“Thus as to the prices; advertising and promotion; glycerine; tallow and grease, plaintiff has stated some of the ultimate fact upon which it will rely. My comments on plaintiff’s new Statements were not intended to be exhaustive, but only to illustrate my tentative thinking regarding the main objection now raised by the defendants. Of course, I want to hear the views of counsel on the problem.

"3. Has there been compliance with all prior discovery orders, because as I noted in my letter of October 22 it then appeared that some documents were currently being produced.

"4. Modification of the motion. Item 4 in the Court's letter of the same date suggested that [fol. 1404] plaintiff might desire to modify its motion and the reports by Lever and Procter indicate that plaintiff concedes that some of the material demanded either would be withdrawn or disposed of by stipulation.

"Of course, still we are faced with the problem of how many years back should production be ordered. In plaintiff's Tentative Statements, however, there are date references tied in with certain alleged conduct, as, for example, beginning in 1936 defendants have fixed prices; in 1926 defendants formed the defendant Association; beginning in 1937 defendants established identical list prices.

"Such 'when' information is an improvement over the sole allegation in the complaint as to the date—'Beginning in 1926 and continuing thereafter,'—which is found on page 10, Item 32 of the complaint.

"I now ask if all counsel agree with Procter's statement at page 10 of its report that we should defer argument regarding a cut-off date? Or should the question now be argued?"¹⁶

Although plaintiff admitted it had discovered many facts from the documents previously produced, it vigorously argued that defendants did not then need those facts. The court was persuaded that plaintiff improperly had refused to reveal facts even though several days earlier on December 3, 1954, it had submitted to defendants "Tentative Statements of Issues of Fact," relating to: (1) prices and costs, (2) advertising and promotions, (3) glycerine, (4) tallow and grease.¹⁷ While those statements were more specific than the allegations in the complaint, (see for example, the court's December 7, 1954, comments, quoted supra,) it was obvious that plaintiff could have stated more facts. Believing that in a protracted anti-trust action there [fol. 1405] must be an early disclosure of facts, the court suggested and the parties accepted a procedure. It was designed to hurdle what the court felt was the only obstacle to defendants' consent to produce some documents and to give defendants the facts relied upon by plaintiff, permitting plaintiff to object to being ordered to disclose any detailed, evidential facts.

"Using the plaintiff's tentative statements of issues of fact as a basis—

"(1) Within ten days from today, defendants submit to court and counsel their questions, such as Mr. Fortas' oral questions in court today, directed to the plaintiff's statements.

"(2) Within ten days after defendants have served and filed their questions, plaintiff submit to the court their objections, and, of course, perhaps as to some questions plaintiff will not object to supplying answers.

"(3) Court will rule on which questions must be answered.

"(4) Then within two weeks of the Court's rulings on the questions and answers, plaintiff serve and file answers.

"(5) Then within one month both parties, either with or without the Court's aid, agree on voluntary production and where there is disagreement the Court will rule and enter orders based on plaintiff's refrained motion. As to the time intervals, if counsel believe more time is needed, let's settle it now and there will be no extensions."

Commencing about January 1, 1955, and continuing until January 13, 1955, Procter, Colgate, and Lever submitted their questions relating to plaintiff's tentative statements of issues of fact; for example, one of plaintiff's statements as to prices and costs was "1. In 1926 Procter, Lever, and the three companies which later merged to form Colgate joined with other soap manufacturers to establish the defendant Association for the purpose, among others, of considering joint action among such manufacturers with respect to matters affecting prices." Lever asked five questions relating to that statement: "1. Is the reference to 'such manufacturers' meant to include all the soap manufacturers forming the Association. 2. Specify [fol. 1406] the 'joint action * * * with respect to matters affecting prices' for which the Association was allegedly established. 3. Specify the other purposes for which the Association was established. 4. Identify the 'matters' as to which the soap manufacturers are alleged to have considered joint action affecting prices; specify the use or proposed use of the Association in relation thereto; and describe the activities of Lever Brothers in connection therewith. 5. Identify the documents presently in the Government's possession which provide a basis for the allegations and which show that Lever Brothers participated in the activities described in [the statement]." Plaintiff answered the questions: 1. Yes. 2. "To eliminate 'trade wars,' 'cannibalism' and 'forcing' in the manufacture and sale of soap products; to increase the revenue obtainable from the sale of glycerine, the principal by-product from the manufacture of soap. 3. " * * * according to its Certificate of Incorporation, were: " * * * collecting and circulating information valuable and useful to the public with reference to the use of soap and kindred products, * * * investigating the nature and use of glycerine and kindred substances and disseminating information with reference thereto, and * * * promoting the best interests of producers of soap and glycerine and kindred products.' " 4. "The Association was established for the purpose of considering joint action with respect to the following matters allegedly affecting the prices of household soap products and glycerine: excessive glycerine production and supply; excessive household soap production and supply; trade wars; cannibalism; and forcing. The use of the Association in relation thereto was that stated in the issue, namely 'considering joint action.' In this respect, the Association was used as a forum or meeting ground. Lever Brothers, either directly or through its officers and agents, attended meetings [fol. 1407] of the Association, served on Association committees, held official positions and memberships on the Board of Directors, voted, paid dues and made other financial contributions to support Association activities, and in general took part in activities of the Association." As to question 5., the court sustained plaintiff's objection to answering it.

¹⁷ Plaintiff also submitted on February 18, 1955, statements relating to mergers and acquisitions, and patents, and on May 9, 1955, market position.

January 13, 1955, plaintiff filed a brief objecting to some of defendants' question. The objections mainly were to questions asking for a designation of documents relied upon as evidence of alleged facts,¹⁸ and to questions asking for detailed evidential facts.¹⁹

January 25, 1955, the court filed its opinion:

"The procedure suggested by this court and accepted by all counsel during the December 7, 1954 hearing (transcript pp. 97-8) was devised because the defendants properly asked the plaintiff to disclose what facts it had ascertained from the produced documents.

"Pursuant to phase (1) of the procedure the defendants have served and filed questions directed to the plaintiff's Tentative Statements of Issues of Fact, and pursuant to phase (2) the plaintiff has served and filed its objections to answering certain questions.

"At this time, the plaintiff need not designate the documents relied upon or set forth the substance of its evidence of the alleged facts. Although I did not believe that the defendants now would ask for such information, nevertheless, during the hearing on plaintiff's reframed motion (see phase (5) transcript p. 98) I shall hear counsel on the problem. My present thinking is that plaintiff should designate documents when it completes discovery under Rule 34 after documents are produced pursuant to the reframed motion.

¹⁹ For example, "state the basis upon which it is alleged"; "indicate all instances"; "describe the information exchanged"; "specify the dates, place, quantity, etc."

"As to the questions objected to by the numbers listed at pp. 9 and 10 in the plaintiff's Memorandum of Objections dated January 13, 1955, I hereby order that [fol. 1408] the following questions be answered:

PROCTER

57, 58, 81, 112, 132, 134.

LEVER

81, 87, 93, 94, 116, 124.

41, 42, 75.

"As to the questions objected to by the numbers listed at footnote 3, p. 10 of plaintiff's Memorandum, the above orders will guide plaintiff and I shall rely on its good faith in answering those questions in accord with the orders herein and the intent and spirit of Rule 33.

"Within one month after the date on which plaintiff completes the service and filing of its answers to the questions, unless plaintiff requests an extension of time, counsel for both sides will attempt to agree on voluntary production, and where there is disagreement I anticipate the filing of a reframed motion under Rule 34 (transcript, p. 98)."

Pursuant to the court's opinion, on March 2, 1955, plaintiff answered the questions which previously it had objected to answering. Then for the next several months defendants and plaintiff continued to exchange questions and answers based upon plaintiff's Tentative Statements. Finally, on April 19, 1955, after counsel had conferred five times, they appeared in court and presented their consent orders.²⁰

²⁰ See footnote 1, supra. Since plaintiff had not submitted its Tentative Statement relating to market position, the consent orders did not cover the relevant documents. However, in May, June, and July, 1955, plaintiff submitted its

NOTICE OF HEARING ON MOTION FOR ORDER—Filed May 2, 1956

To: Raymond Del Tufo, Jr., Esq., United States Attorney for the District of New Jersey, Federal Building, Newark, New Jersey. Joseph E. McDowell, Esq., Special Assistant to the Attorney General, Antitrust Division, Department of Justice, Washington, D. C. Kenneth C. Royall, Esq., Dwight, Royall, Harris, Koehel & Caskey, 100 Broadway, New York 5, New York. Mathias F. Correa, Esq., Cahill, Gordon, Reindel & Ohl, 63 Wall Street, New York 5, New York. Abe Fortas, Esq., Arnold, Fortas & Porter, 1229 Nineteenth Street, N.W., Washington 6, D.C.

SIRS:

A copy of a proposed order, substantially in the form annexed hereto, having been presented to the attorney for the Plaintiff on April 24, 1956, and the Defendant, The Association of American Soap & Glycerine Producers, Inc., not having been advised as to whether the form of said order [fol. 1411] was satisfactory to the Plaintiff,

Please take notice that on the 14th day of May, 1956, at 10:00 A.M. or on such earlier date as may be agreeable to the Court and the parties herein at the Federal Court-house, Newark, New Jersey, the Association shall present to the Court for entry, a proposed order, a copy of which Statement relating to market position, defendants asked their questions, and plaintiff answered them. The parties have not advised the court concerning the so-called market position documents described in plaintiff's Rule 34 motions. Since, however, plaintiff has submitted its Tentative Statement relating to market position, and the parties have exchanged questions and answers, it appears that consent orders will be presented.

PROPOSED ORDER

The defendant, the Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc. (hereinafter called "the Association"), having filed a motion herein on November 25, 1955, for an order granting leave to inspect and copy transcripts of the testimony of all witnesses before the Grand Jury of the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey, sitting in Newark, New Jersey, from May 1951 to November 1952 in so far as such testimony related to the investigation of possible antitrust law violations in the soap and synthetic detergent industry; and the Court having heard and considered arguments and briefs of counsel, and having rendered its opinion, filed April 17, 1956, setting forth, among other things, the facts and circumstances upon which the Court's decision and this order are based,

Now, therefore, it is Ordered, that the motion of the Association be and it hereby is granted, and that plaintiff, within thirty (30) days from the entry of this order, produce at the offices of the Department of Justice, Washington, D.C. or such other place as the parties may agree, and permit the Association or its counsel to inspect and copy, by photostating or other means, all or any part of the transcripts of the testimony [fols. 1413-1415] of all witnesses who appeared before the Grand Jury of this Court sitting in Newark, New Jersey, from May 1951 through November 25, 1952 in connection with an investigation of possible violations of the antitrust laws of the United States in the soap and synthetic detergent industry.

PROPOSED ORDER

The defendant, The Procter & Gamble Company (hereinafter called "Procter"), having filed a motion herein on September 24, 1954, for an order granting leave to inspect and copy transcripts of the testimony of all witnesses before the Grand Jury of the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey, sitting in Newark, New Jersey, from May 1951 to November 1952 in so far as such testimony related to the investigation of possible antitrust law violations in the soap and synthetic detergent industry; and the Court having heard and considered arguments and briefs of counsel, and having rendered its opinion, filed April 17, 1956, setting forth, among other things, the facts and circumstances upon which the Court's decision and this order are based,

Now, therefore, it is Ordered, that the motion of Procter be and it hereby is granted, and that plaintiff, within thirty (30) days from [fol. 1421] the entry of this order, produce at the offices of the Department of Justice, Washington, D. C., or such other place as the parties may agree, and permit Procter or its counsel to inspect and copy, by photostating or other means, all or any part of the transcripts of the testimony of all witnesses who appeared before the said Grand Jury sitting in Newark, New Jersey, from May 1951 through November 25, 1952, in connection with an investigation of possible violations of the antitrust laws of the United States in the soap and synthetic detergent industry.

PROPOSAL ORDER

The defendant, Colgate-Palmolive Company (hereinafter called "Colgate"), having filed a motion herein on November 28, 1955, for an order granting leave to inspect and copy transcripts of the testimony of all witnesses before the Grand Jury of the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey, sitting in Newark, New Jersey, from May 1951 to November 1952 in so far as such testimony related to the investigation of possible antitrust law violations in the soap and synthetic detergent industry; and the Court having heard and considered arguments and briefs of counsel, and having rendered its opinion, filed April 17, 1956, setting forth, among other things, the facts and circumstances upon which the Court's decision and this order are based,

Now, therefore, it is Ordered, that the motion of Colgate be and it hereby is granted, and that plaintiff, within thirty (30) days from the entry of this order, produce at the offices of the Department of Justice, Washington, D. C., or such other place as [fol. 1428] the parties may agree, and permit Colgate or its counsel to inspect and copy, by photostating or other means, all or any part of the transcripts of the testimony of all witnesses who appeared before the Grand Jury of this Court sitting in Newark, New Jersey, from May 1951 through November 25, 1952, in connection with an investigation of possible violations of the antitrust laws of the United States in the soap and synthetic detergent industry:

MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION OF RULING ON DEFENDANTS' MOTIONS TO INSPECT THE GRAND JURY TRANSCRIPTS AND FOR RULING ON CLAIM OF PRIVILEGE—Filed May 3, 1956

Whereas, each of the defendants has moved the Court to compel disclosure of transcripts of testimony of all witnesses who appeared before a Federal Grand Jury which sat in Newark, N. J. from May 1951 through November 25, 1952; and

Whereas, the Court in its opinion dated April 17, 1956 reached the conclusion that an order compelling the requested disclosure may and should properly be granted under the discovery provisions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and in accordance with its decision has directed that such an order be submitted; and

Whereas, the Attorney General of the United States has determined that disclosure of the transcript of testimony of any witness before the said grand jury for the use of defendants in this case would be prejudicial to the grand jury system and not in the public interest, and has filed with this Court a formal Claim of Privilege asserting the privileged status of said transcripts of grand jury testimony;

Now, plaintiff respectfully moves that this Court reconsider its conclusion that the extensive scope of pre-trial discovery permitted under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure [fol. 1435] warrants disclosure in this civil case of traditionally secret grand jury proceedings, and, in the light of the claim of privilege asserted by the Attorney General, that this Court sustain the privileged status of the grand jury transcripts and enter an order denying defendants access to the transcript of testimony of any witness before the said grand jury.

Dated: April 30, 1956.

(S.) Stanley N. Barnes, Assistant Attorney General.

(S.) Victor H. Kramer, Attorney, Department of Justice. Joseph E. McDowell, Attorney, Department of Justice.

[fol. 1436] IN UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY

[Title omitted]

CLAIM OF PRIVILEGE—Filed May 3, 1956

Privilege is claimed for the transcripts of testimony of all witnesses before the federal grand jury impaneled in the District of New Jersey from May 1951 to November 25, 1952, which made inquiries concerning possible violations of the federal antitrust laws by persons in the soap and synthetic detergent industry. This privilege I now assert to fulfill the Attorney General's joint responsibility with the courts to protect the integrity of grand jury processes. The assertion of privilege is based on a careful consideration of the effects of the disclosure of transcripts of testimony of grand jury witnesses upon the public interest in the proper administration of justice.

My claim of privilege here is rooted in the established policies underlying non-disclosure of grand jury transcripts. One of the important reasons for the long standing public policy against disclosure of grand jury proceedings and testimony is "to encourage free and untrammelled disclosures by persons who have information with respect to the commission of crimes," United States v. Rose, 215 F. 2d 617, 628, and that "those who testify may feel free to speak [fol. 1437] the truth without reserve", Goodman v. United States, 108 F. 2d 516, 519, 522. This is essential to the effective administration of justice.

The Department of Justice holds the transcripts of grand jury testimony as a trustee for the benefit of the people. The privilege against disclosure of such transcripts is that of the government, and not of the witnesses, and cannot be waived by consent of the witnesses. It is the obligation of the government to protect witnesses from any form of pressure or compulsion to disclose what was said in the privacy of the grand jury. The suggestion that the guarantee of secrecy of testimony given before a grand jury is, however, temporary, and ends after the grand jury has been discharged, overlooks a fundamental difficulty. Employees of the defendants and persons who do business with them, to whom the continued good will of the defendants is important, have heretofore given their testimony in what was thought to be strictest confidence. Acquiescence in the proposed order would constitute notice to every future witness in a grand jury proceeding that his testimony may in the future be disclosed to an employer, or business associate, or other person whose continued good will is important to his economic welfare. Under such circumstances, there would be a strong incentive for the witness to refrain from giving testimony which would be detrimental to the interests of economically powerful potential defendants. It would also tend to intimidate those who might otherwise give testimony against racketeers, mobsters and gangsters, thereby subverting the entire grand jury system.

For these reasons, the disclosure by the Department of Justice of the transcripts of testimony of witnesses before the grand jury for use of defendants in this civil case would be prejudicial to the efficient and effective use of grand [fol. 1438] juries as instrumentalities for the detection and investigation of crimes, and would thus be prejudicial to our grand jury system and contrary to the public interest. Accordingly, by virtue of the authority vested in me, and for the reasons given, I assert the privileged status of said transcripts of testimony.

Respectfully, Herbert Brownell, Jr., Attorney General.

Dated: April 30th, 1956.

[fol. 1439] GOVERNMENT'S MEMORANDUM OF POINTS AND AUTHORITIES IN SUPPORT OF MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION OF RULING ON DEFENDANTS' MOTIONS TO INSPECT THE GRAND JURY TRANSCRIPTS AND FOR RULING ON CLAIM OF PRIVILEGE—Filed May 3, 1956.

This memorandum is in support of the government's motion for a reconsideration by the Court of its opinion of April 17, 1956, that plaintiff should be required to produce and permit the inspection and copying by defendants of certain grand jury transcripts. The pertinent facts are fully set forth in the Brief of The United States in Opposition to Motions for Production of Grand Jury Transcripts, dated December 7, 1955.

Plaintiff urges the Court to sustain the Claim of Privilege filed herewith by the Attorney General of the United States and enter an order denying defendants access to said grand jury transcripts.

[fol. 1440] Question Presented

Should production of grand jury transcripts be ordered in this case for discovery purposes after the Attorney General has determined that disclosure would be contrary to the public interest?

Points and Authorities

Public policy for the protection of the grand jury is opposed to disclosure of grand jury proceedings and testimony.

United States v. Rose, 215 F. 2d 617, 628 (C.A. 3, 1954).

United States v. Garsson, 291 F. 646 (D.C. S.D. N.Y., 1923).

United States v. Smyth, 104 F. Supp. 283, 303 (D.C. N.D. Calif., 1952).

United States v. American Medical Association, 26 F. Supp. 429 (D.C. D.C., 1939).

Exceptions to the rule of secrecy have been made only where the courts have concluded that partial and narrowly limited disclosure was required (1) at trial, in the exercise of the courts' supervisory responsibilities under Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, (2) for the protection of the rights of the accused in criminal cases, (3) on other grounds peculiar to criminal cases, and (4) by the public interest in permitting disclosure to public officials in the enforcement of law.

United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, pp. 233-234.

[fol. 1441] Schmidt v. United States, 115 F. 2d 394 (C.A. 6, 1940).

United States v. White, 104 F. Supp. 120 (D.C. N.J., 1952)

United States v. Alper, 156 F. 2d 222 (C.A. 2, 1946)
Herzog v. United States, 75 S. Ct. 349 (1955); 226 F.
 2d 561 (C.A. 9, 1955).

 E.D. Pa., 1933).

In re Bullock, 103 F. Supp. 639 (D.C. D.C., 1952).

It is immaterial that the grand jury has been discharged and that its investigation has been followed by an action for civil rather than criminal enforcement of the antitrust laws, because in any event the disclosure of testimony given in secret would tend in future investigations to restrict the free functioning of the grand jury.

United States v. Standard Oil Company of California, et al., Civil No. 11584-C, S.D. Calif., C. Div., Minutes of the Court, March 30, 1956.

 1939).

United States v. American Medical Association, 26
 F. Supp. 429 (D.C. D.C., 1939).

Production of grand jury transcripts should be denied where, as here, the Attorney General has determined that disclosure would be contrary to the public interest, and defendants have other means of obtaining all information necessary to the preparation of their case—particularly where defendants have conceded that they have other means by which they could obtain information concerning the very matters which were the subject of grand jury testimony.

[Title omitted]

AFFIDAVIT—Filed May 16, 1956

STATE OF NEW YORK,

County of New York, ss:

MATHIAS F. CORREA, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

1. He is an attorney-at-law and a member of the firm of Cahill, Gordon, Reindel & Ohl, who, with O'Mara, Schumann, Davis & Lynch, are attorneys for defendant Colgate-Palmolive Company in the above entitled action. This affidavit is submitted in opposition to the motion herein by the plaintiff for reconsideration by this Court of the decision of this Court of April 17, 1956 that an order be made and entered herein requiring plaintiff to produce for inspection and copying by the defendant Colgate-Palmolive Company the transcript of the testimony of witnesses in an investigation of possible violations of the antitrust laws in the soap and detergent industry conducted by a Grand Jury of this Court from May, 1951 to November 25, 1952.

2. Plaintiff's motion is a naked motion for reconsideration by the Court of its decision. Plaintiff submits in support of its motion no new facts, no new legal authorities, [fol. 1452] and no new factual or legal arguments.

3. Plaintiff apparently has not changed the position which it has taken throughout the course of this matter that it will decline to give the Court a candid statement as to whether or not and the extent to which it has used the Grand Jury minutes in the preparation of its case to date or plans to use them in the further preparation of its case or upon the trial of the case. As the Court's decision herein notes, the evidence is rather overwhelming that plaintiff has used the Grand Jury minutes extensively in the preparation of its case and plans to use them further.

4. Plaintiff does submit certain of its legal authorities and arguments cited in support of its motion which have heretofore been urged upon the Court by plaintiff in the form of a so-called "claim of privilege" over the signature of the Attorney General. If this were a case involving a proper plea of privilege by the head of an Executive Department with respect to state secrets whose protection was by law made the duty of such Department and if the claim were interposed timely as this one is not, the execution of the so-called "claim of privilege" by the head of an Executive Department might be relevant to the question before the Court. Such is not the case, however, as the question here relates to the disclosure of the minutes of testimony taken before a Grand Jury of this Court carrying out its duties as an arm of this Court.

5. As has been exhaustively briefed to the Court and as this Court has decided, the determination of questions of public interest involved in such a decision is the ultimate and exclusive responsibility of the Court itself. Accordingly, the so-called "claim of privilege" submitted in [fol. 1453] support of plaintiff's motion can have no more standing than any other legal or factual argument submitted in whatever form by plaintiff's attorneys.

6. That plaintiff's attorneys themselves do not seriously believe it has any different status than the arguments previously advanced by them is strongly indicated by the letter dated April 5, 1956 of the Assistant Attorney General in Charge of the Antitrust Division to the Court in this case. In his letter, in the course of discussion of the case of U.S. v. Standard Oil Company of California, et al., in the Southern District of California, the Assistant Attorney General refers to a so-called "claim of privilege" filed in that case and states of it that it was "based on the same grounds urged by counsel for the Government in the motions now pending before you." The letter also enclosed a copy of the so-called "claim of privilege" interposed in the California case. Comparison of it with the similar claim filed in the instant case discloses that with certain minor and immaterial exceptions they are word for word identical.

7. We see no point or purpose in following plaintiff's lead by repeating and reiterating to the Court in opposition to this motion the identical arguments and citations in support thereof which we have submitted to the Court in support of our position on the motion of whose decision the instant motion seeks reconsideration. These are before the Court and we respectfully refer the Court to them for a complete answer to and refutation of the various contentions heretofore advanced by plaintiff and repeated in its moving papers on this motion.

[fols. 1454-1457] Wherefore, it is respectfully submitted that plaintiff's motion for reconsideration should be in all respects denied.

Mathias F. Correa.

Sworn to before me this 15th day of May, 1956.

John Nicol, Notary Public. (Seal.)

MODARELLI, District Judge.

On April 17, 1956, I filed an opinion on defendants' motions to compel plaintiff to produce and permit the inspection and copying by the defendants of the transcripts of the testimony of all witnesses who appeared before a grand jury sitting in this district from May, 1951, until November 25, 1952. I concluded that since plaintiff is using the transcripts containing relevant information, and since equal use of the transcripts by defendants will give them the fullest possible knowledge of the facts before trial, and since none of the reasons for the rule of secrecy applies, the ends of justice required me to grant the motions.

Now before me are: (1) Plaintiff's motion that " * * * this Court reconsider its conclusion that the extensive scope of pre-trial discovery permitted under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure warrants disclosure in this civil case of traditionally secret grand jury proceedings, and, in the light of the claim of privilege asserted by the Attorney General, that this Court sustain the privileged status of the grand jury transcripts and enter an order denying [fol. 1466] defendants access to the transcript of testimony of any witness before the said grand jury." (2) Defendants' motions for settlement of the order directed by me in my opinion granting defendants' motions to produce the transcripts.

(1) As to plaintiff's motion, at the beginning of the oral argument I cautioned its counsel against repeating arguments already presented and considered on the original motion.¹ As his arguments progressed, even though he presented nothing new, I permitted him to argue extensively (approximately 54 transcript pages) because I believed that in accordance with my opening remark he would present something new.² He did not.

Plaintiff's motion is based upon a "Claim of Privilege" filed by Attorney General Brownell. Summarized, his claim

¹ As a result of counsel's disregard of my warning and because it is difficult for a judge to refuse to hear oral argument when counsel are present in court, or to halt it once it has begun, the Judges of this Court on June 18, 1956, adopted a new rule:

"A motion for re-argument shall be made within 14 days after the filing of the court's determination of the original motion and upon the same notice required for the original motion. There shall be served with the notice a memorandum, setting forth concisely the matters or controlling decisions which counsel believes the court has overlooked. No oral argument shall be heard unless the court grants the motion and specifically directs that the matters shall be re-argued orally." (Emphasis supplied.)

Of course, the rule does not apply here, but the emphasized portion does express the proper nature of re-argument.

² United States v. Reynolds, 395 U.S. 1, 10, 11 (1953) does indicate that after the court has filed an opinion granting discovery against the United States, it is proper to file a formal claim of privilege. But here, as will be discussed, all of the contentions in the claim filed by Attorney General Brownell were presented to and considered by me on the original motion, even though no formal claim had been filed.

is that it is his joint duty with the court to protect the integrity of the grand jury processes; he has carefully [fol. 1467] considered the effects of disclosure of the transcripts upon the public interest in the proper administration of justice; the established policy of secrecy is based upon a desire to encourage free disclosure by grand jury witnesses; if the court orders disclosure of the transcripts, future grand jury witnesses will be reluctant to give testimony detrimental to the interests of economically powerful potential defendants.

In support of its claim of privilege, plaintiff cites the following cases: United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 233-234 (1940); United States v. Rose, 215 F. 2d 617, 628 (CA 3 1954); United States v. Alper, 156 F. 2d 222 (CA 2 1946); Schmidt v. United States, 115 F. 2d 394 (CA 6 1940); Goodman v. United States, 108 F. 2d 516 (CA 9 1939); United States v. General Motors Corp., 15 F.R.D. 486 (D.C. Del. 1954); United States v. Smyth, 104 F. Supp. 283, 303 (D.C. N.D. Calif. 1952); In re Bullock, 103 F. Supp. 639 (D.C. D.C. 1952); United States v. White, 104 F. Supp. 120 (D.C. N.J. 1952); United States v. American Medical Association, 26 F. Supp. 429 (D.C. D.C. 1939); In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 4 F. Supp. 283 (D.C. E.D. Pa. 1933); United States v. Garsson, 291 F. 646 (D.C. S.D. N.Y. 1923); United States v. Standard Oil Company of California, et al. Civil No. 11584-C, D.C. Calif., Minutes of the Court, March 30, 1956; United States v. Morgan, Civil Action No. 43-757, (S.D. N.Y., unreported ruling of Judge Medina, December 8, 1948).

The Socony-Vacuum, Rose, General Motors, Garsson, and Morgan cases were already considered and are discussed in my opinion. The cited portion of the Smyth case merely states the general rule of secrecy, which I thoroughly discussed in my opinion. Alper, Schmidt, Goodman, Bullock, American Medical Association, and In re Grand Jury Proceedings recognize that a court should order disclosure when in its judgment the ends of justice so require, which was one of the bases of my decision. White recognizes an exception [fol. 1468] to secrecy in cases of extreme compulsion where there is a strong and positive showing, which is the case here. There was no opinion in Standard Oil. As to the other cited cases relating to plaintiff's fourth point concerning "other means" by which defendants could acquire the information contained in the grand jury transcripts. I also previously considered that argument and I rejected it.

At page 12 of my opinion, I said, "I would not grant these motions if I thought they were prejudicial to the public interest, useless or unnecessary, would not reveal the information sought, or defendants already possessed all the necessary information or could obtain it by pursuing a different remedy." That conclusion was reached after thorough deliberation and analysis of the problems and authorities. Before me at that time was a letter and enclosure from Assistant Attorney General Barnes. He told me about an identical claim of privilege asserted in United States v. Standard Oil Company of California, et al; he noted that the claim was " * * * based on the same grounds urged by counsel for the Government in the motions now pending before you." He enclosed that claim of privilege signed by Mr. Brownell and it was nearly identical to the one he recently filed in this case. Thus, nothing has been brought to my attention since I filed my opinion that was not before me when I considered defendants' motions. Plaintiff's motion is denied.

During oral argument plaintiff's counsel said, " * * * I did not understand that there was any question but what the Government had the use of the grand jury transcripts. There never has been any question but that the Government feels free, indeed obligated, to use information obtained from grand jury investigations in the preparation of civil actions which the Government is required to bring in its sovereign regulatory capacity under a statute which, as here, requires the Government to proceed to seek to restrain [fol. 1469-1470] and prevent violations." (Tr: 12). If that revelation had been in response to my earlier questions regarding plaintiff's use of the transcripts, it would have saved defendants' counsel and me many hours of research and deliberation concerning the very important question as to whether plaintiff is using the transcripts. (See opinion dated April 17, 1956, pp. 4-7.) While it is the duty of the attorneys in the Department of Justice to be zealous advocates, this was an inexcusable concealment from the court of a fact material to the issue involved in defendants' motions to produce. I make this criticism because in this "Big Case" it is essential that counsel be cooperative and candid.

(2) As to defendants' motions, plaintiff and defendants will exchange their proposed form of the order. If both sides are unable to agree upon the form, I shall enter an order in a form that I believe is proper.

An order shall be submitted in conformity with this opinion.

COLLOQUY

The Court: Now, I should say, before we start, that while there is no local rule of court here concerning the granting of permission to reargue a matter that has been rehearsed before, the rules also provide, in the absence of a local rule of court, the state rules apply, the rules of the Supreme Court of New Jersey, and they do provide for granting permission to reargue.

I am sure that you didn't know that, Mr. McDowell, did you?

Mr. McDowell: I did know, your Honor, that local rules are applicable.

The Court: Mr. Rossi.

Mr. Rossi: Your Honor, it gives me pleasure at this time to introduce Mrs. Jennie Crowley, of the Antitrust Division of the Department. She is admitted to practice in the State of Pennsylvania and the District of Columbia. I respectfully move her admission.

The Court: The motion is granted, Mrs. Crowley.

Now, obviously, Mr. McDowell, if it is your intention to bring to my attention matters which you have brought to my attention heretofore, I don't think we should waste your time, my time or your adversaries' time. I want to [fol. 1486] assure you right now that in no motion that has been presented to this Court since I have been on this bench has there been more time, energy and effort expended than in the determination of this motion.

And I want you to know that I was very conscious of what my determination would stand for. Great consideration was given to it, much consideration.

Now, if you have anything new to bring to my attention which you think might alter my opinion as filed, I would be very happy to hear it; if not, I don't think you should waste your time, either.

STATEMENT BY MR. McDOWELL.

Mr. McDowell: Thank you.

When this Court published its opinion on April 17th that grand jury transcripts should be produced here for civil discovery purposes, very serious consideration was given to this matter, not only by the Attorney General personally, but by his advisers, including the Assistant Attorneys General in charge of the Criminal Division and Civil Division, Antitrust Division, and other officials of the Department representing other divisions of the Department. And those officials were disturbed at the implications of a ruling which would require the transcripts of an entire grand jury investigation to be opened up for civil discovery purposes. The implications of such a ruling quite clearly go far beyond this particular case.

This is not a case in which the Department of Justice appears here representing the Government in behalf of a claim for money damages analogous to ordinary private litigation.

Ever since the decision in the Northern Securities case, decided in 1904, 193 U. S. 197, it has been recognized and settled that in the prosecution of civil actions for the enforcement of the Sherman Act, the Government is performing a sovereign regulatory function in the representation of a public interest declared by the Congress. If the Attorney General were to acquiesce in the view that grand jury transcripts are subject to discovery in this action it would be difficult to maintain that they must be withheld from defendants generally in civil antitrust proceedings and, by the same token, in many other types of proceedings.

It is questionable whether any distinction can be made between this situation, where the Government must proceed on the civil side, in response to a command of the Congress, to enforce a criminal statute by seeking to enjoin and to prevent violations of that statute, and other situations where the Government must take civil actions in [fol. 1488] response to a command of the Congress, and in its sovereign regulatory capacity either to enforce a criminal statute or to enforce a public interest under related statutes. It is questionable whether it would be possible, even if it were desirable, for the Government to set up airtight compartments, or to put blinders on the eyes of its attorneys, so that no use could be made in civil proceedings arising in the regulatory capacity of the Government of information obtained through grand jury investigations. The question is of particular pertinence, and the greatest difficulty is experienced, not in isolated individual violations, such as a conversion case, or a fraud case, but in cases of conspiracy, where numerous violations may flow, or numerous individual acts may flow from an overall scheme having its roots in different areas and perhaps scattered among a wide number of actors throughout the country.

Must the Government, in order to avoid the risk and peril to the grand jury institution, implicit in any disclosure of the proceedings of an entire grand jury investigation, blind itself, or throw away one of the principal investigatory weapons, and agencies, instrumentalities available to the Government, and which has been available [fol. 1489] through custom under this and under related statutes?

May I suggest one or two examples which go beyond the immediately obvious, I think, examples? Under the Internal Security Act of 1950 the Attorney General is required, just as in the Sherman Act, to resort to civil proceedings. There it is true, the proceedings are not before a court; they are before the Subversive Activities Control Board. But the statute provides for the issuance of subpoenas, requires that subpoenas be issued in those civil proceedings to bring forward any relevant fact, documents or information. It has not occurred to any of the parties involved in any of those proceedings to attempt even to subpoena grand jury transcripts arising from the grand jury investigations, grand jury proceedings, under related statutes which the Government has been compelled to participate in.

Again, under the Civil Rights legislation now before the Congress, certain conduct which might interfere, which might have the effect of interfering with the exercise of civil rights, such as voting, and other rights, is proscribed and made criminal in character. The Attorney General has testified before the Senate Committee considering this legislation that it is the intention of the Government to rely [fol. 1490] primarily, however, for the enforcement of this statute upon the civil provisions which require, in the draft legislation now before the Congress, that the attorneys for the Government seek in civil proceedings to enjoin and to prevent violations. That statute, that draft legislation, is modeled very closely on the Sherman Act, it is not a unique pattern. There has been no suggestion in the hearings that the Government should not have the benefit in the course of the civil proceedings which are contemplated, upon which it will have to rely, of information obtained, particularly in cases of widespread conspiracy, of information which may be obtainable by the Government only through grand jury investigation.

There is another aspect to this matter which raises problems, when it is considered that it is the practice of the Government to present before grand juries, or that questions asked by Government attorneys appearing before grand juries sometimes necessarily must disclose information which has previously been obtained by the Government through other investigative means, including the FBI. Obviously, any wholesale disclosure of the transcript of an entire grand jury proceeding would open up those matters, [fol. 1491] too, so that the threat would be posed to other investigative techniques.

Again, could the application of this principle of disclosure be confined to civil proceedings? Could the Government successfully oppose the production of grand jury transcripts where there are pending companion civil and criminal proceedings? In the proper exercise of the discretion conferred by the Sherman Act, which was explicitly sanctioned by the Supreme Court in the Standard Sanitary case—United States versus Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Company, 226 U. S. 20, which was decided in 1912—and that opinion, I may say, was written by Mr. Justice McKenna—the Government may elect, under the Sherman Act, to bring either a criminal indictment or to proceed civilly, as it is required in appropriate cases under the express language of the statute to do, to seek to enjoin and prevent violations of that criminal statute. And it was noted in the Northern Securities case, if your Honor please, that the fact that the Government had elected to proceed civilly did not detract from or lessen the fact that the violations against which the action was directed, and which was sought to be enjoined and prevented, were violations [fol. 1492] of a criminal statute, that is, criminal violations.

If the production of grand jury transcripts be required on the civil side, and if the Government in the proper exercise of its discretion, as confirmed by the Supreme Court in the Standard Sanitary case, has pending both criminal and civil proceedings, in the absence of any abuse sufficient to invoke the exercise of the court's supervisory responsibility, would it not follow that grand jury transcripts would also have to be made available on the criminal side in such a case? After all, explicit constitutional safeguards are present on the criminal side. So that that poses an additional threat of extension of such ruling. If the ends of justice may be said to require disclosure on the civil side to assist defendants in the preparation of their case, would it not be anomalous to say that the ends of justice can be served by anything less on the criminal side?

We cannot, of course, foresee all of the consequences of such a ruling, nor can we say definitely that any of the possible consequences would, in fact, result. It is, however, the glory of our system of law that it is dynamic, it grows, it proceeds from principle, decisions embody principles and each new case as it comes along carries the application [fol. 1493] further. It is impossible to see how far the ripples will reach once this stone is cast into the water. We must recognize that the sweeping disclosure, a complete disclosure here of the transcript of an entire grand jury proceeding would involve a fundamental change in our historic, traditional attitude toward grand jury secrecy.

After careful consideration of the implications, and the possible effect of disclosure upon the functioning of the grand jury system, the Attorney General has concluded that it would be injurious to the public interest to disclose the transcript of the grand jury proceedings involved here. By a motion for a ruling on the claim of privilege we ask that the Court accord respect and weight to that determination.

This claim of privilege is not based upon any assertion of executive independence of the judiciary. We do not seek here any exemption from an obligation to which other litigants might be subjected. Obviously grand jury transcripts are a unique property. They are in the possession of the Department of Justice almost by accident, one might say, of statute, and no one else could be compelled or called upon to produce them.

And may I say, your Honor, before going on, that I [fol. 1494] regret very much any failure or inadvertence on my part which may have given any impression that the Government seeks, or has sought in any way to conceal the use made of the grand jury transcripts in connection with this proceeding. I did not understand that there was any question but what the Government had the use of the grand jury transcripts. There never has been any question but that the Government feels free, indeed obligated, to use information obtained from grand jury investigations in the preparation of civil actions which the Government is required to bring in its sovereign regulatory capacity under a statute which, as here, requires the Government to proceed to seek to restrain and prevent violations.

The Court: But that same statute doesn't give the Department the right to issue subpoenas, does it?

Mr. McDowell: Your Honor, that raises a matter of the propriety, as I see it, of the use of the grand jury process. And I propose to come to that.

Rule 6(e) of the Rules of Criminal Procedure authorizes Government attorneys to use grand jury transcripts in the performance of their duties.

At the time Rule 6(e) was drafted and reported to the Congress in 1944 and 1945 it was well known, and it must have been known to members of the Advisory Committee [fol. 1495] who participated in the drafting of those rules, because at least three of them had had substantial experience with the enforcement of the anti-trust laws, that ever since the decision in the Standard Sanitary case, upholding the Government's discretion in this matter, it has been the custom and practice of the Government to institute either civil or criminal proceedings following a grand jury investigation of alleged violations of the Sherman Act, in the proper exercise, as the Supreme Court said in that case, of its discretion. And pretty clearly—I think it can hardly be challenged that where the Government at the conclusion of a grand jury investigation, having weighed whatever factors are appropriate to be weighed—and there are a number of considerations—as to whether or not it should ask the grand jury to vote an indictment—assuming that one has been prepared, and in my experience one doesn't get through a lengthy grand jury investigation without having an indictment prepared—but assuming that the Government in the proper exercise of its discretion, and I know of no serious challenge here to the propriety of the exercise in this case—it is true there have been charges, there have been suggestions—it has become fashionable in recent years for defense counsel [fol. 1496] to question the propriety and to make the assertion that the Government, wherever a grand jury results only in a civil proceeding, has deliberately, and wrongly—usually the “wrongly” is carried by innuendo or implication—used the grand jury process solely for civil discovery purposes.

Now, I may say that that complaint has been publicized for some time and the Congress has not changed the law, the Congress has not changed the Rules of Criminal Procedure, which give us the right to use the information in the performance of our duties. In this particular case I think the affidavit filed by Government counsel, to which your Honor adverted, is a complete answer to any suggestion of abuse of process in this case. That affidavit, the Court will recall, constituted a sworn statement that counsel had been instructed to investigate violations with a view to proceeding either under Section 1, Criminal, Section 2, Criminal, or violation of Section 3, or with the view to proceeding by civil process. So that the whole range of the Act was there involved, as it is in every grand jury investigation, and as it must be under the statutory scheme.

There never has been any question raised by the courts with respect to this matter. As a matter of fact, the question [fol. 1497] has been presented on four different occasions in the courts, either the identical question presented here, or in on case so close—that's the General Motors case—so close that I don't think it can be really distinguished, and there hasn't been any suggestion in any of those decisions that there was an abuse here.

I think it would be helpful, in view of the reference which your Honor made to it, in your opinion, to point out, with respect to this question of use of the transcripts by the Government, that the refusal of the Department of Justice to file either an affidavit or a statement setting forth, in your Honor's words, exactly and in detail the use made of the grand jury transcripts, resulted not from any question but what that use was fully known, as the earlier pleadings and statements made here I thought had indicated, but, rather, from the view that it would be inappropriate to furnish a detailed affidavit or statement setting forth exactly how the results of the grand jury investigation had been incorporated into the Government's overall information, compiled from various sources, both before and since the grand jury investigation, and that it would be impossible to furnish such a statement in meaningful detail without waiv-[fol. 1498] ing the privilege of grand jury secrecy.

The Court will recall that the Government was held to have waived its privilege in the Byoir case by making public reference to grand jury testimony. And the Court will recall that in the Reynolds case the Supreme Court observed the need for caution, that the trial court in examining into the question of basis for privilege not force disclosure of the very thing the privilege was meant to protect.

Now, we think it would be inappropriate for the Court to press us on this point because of the absence here, as we understand it, of any charge of abuse sufficient to invoke the Court's supervisory responsibility over the grand jury proceedings. If that is the case, and we do not understand it to be the case, that the Court wishes to proceed under judicial inquiry, concerning the propriety of the use made of the grand jury transcript, then that is quite another matter and we are fully prepared to cooperate with the Court. But we don't understand that to be the case.

The Court: It is not.

Mr. McDowell: Now, may I mention that the cases to which I had referred, as being the ones in which this identical question had been presented, are the Investment Bank-[fol. 1499] ers case, with which your Honor is familiar—

The Court: Is that the one Judge Medina decided?

Mr. McDowell: Judge Medina's ruling in that case. —and the Standard Oil case—that's U. S. vs. Standard Oil in the Southern District of California, a very recent case, in which after a preliminary hearing on objections to interrogatories which sought to compel the disclosure of the names of the witnesses who appeared before the grand jury—at the conclusion of that preliminary hearing on those objections Judge Carter stated in a pretrial memorandum that, in his opinion, the Government should furnish not only the names of the witnesses, but under certain safeguards a procedure should be set up under which the defendants might obtain access to the transcript of the testimony of those witnesses who would give their consent.

In that situation the Government filed a claim of privilege identical, or virtually identical, to the claim which has been filed here, and the matter was reargued—or was argued on the basis of the claim of privilege. And at the rehearing Judge Carter stated that he did not understand, at the time he prepared his memorandum on the basis of the original partial discussion of this subject, that the Government [fol. 1500] objected to the disclosure of the transcripts of the grand jury proceeding. And since the matter did come up obliquely on this question of interrogatories, it is quite obvious how that confusion could have arisen. In any event, Judge Carter has sustained the claim of privilege, has ruled that the claim of privilege was appropriate and has denied the motions for production—or has stated that he will deny motions for production.

The Court: Is it possible in that case before Judge Carter that the Government didn't make its position quite clear, as they did here, that they objected strenuously to the disclosure of the grand jury minutes; is that possible?

Mr. McDowell: Well, your Honor, I think that the difficulty arises from the fact that the question was argued on the point whether or not the names of witnesses should be furnished, and Judge Carter in the course of the argument, for some reason, apparently drew the conclusion that the Government did not object to the furnishing of the transcripts of the testimony in appropriate cases. That question was not specifically before him on the argument. The argument went only to the question of—

The Court: The names of witnesses.

[fol. 1501] Mr. McDowell:—whether the names of witnesses should be furnished. So that confusion is understandable.

I may say, in all fairness, your Honor—I don't know whether counsel here have had the benefit of seeing the transcript of that hearing,—but counsel for the defendant in that case stated—very deferentially, but nonetheless vigorously—that they had not so understood, they stated that there never had been any confusion in their minds but that the Government was opposing the furnishing of the transcripts.

Of course, the General Motors case to which I referred a moment ago is very close to the situation here, the only distinction there being that it arose not under the Sherman Act but under a similar statutory scheme.

The Darling case, which is unreported, was an identical situation. I mention it not as authority, in view of your Honor's statement in his opinion about the problem of unreported decisions, not as authority for the main issue here, that the transcripts should not be furnished, but rather as an instance in which this question of the propriety of the use has been raised with the courts, and the [fol. 1502] courts have given no indication that they see any abuse in the use by the Government of information obtained by the grand jury proceedings.

This question has been presented in an analogous situation, not on the precise issue involved here, to the Supreme Court. And there I refer to the Wallace & Tiernan case. That's 366 U.S. 793, 1949. That was a civil action under the Sherman Act, instituted after a grand jury investigation, in which there was also an indictment returned. Subsequently the Supreme Court decided in the Ballard case—Ballard v. U. S.; it is unimportant here; 329 U. S. 187—that the deliberate exclusion of women from a grand jury panel invalidated the indictment. In consequence of that decision the trial court, the District Court before whom the Wallace & Tiernan civil action and indictment were pending, dismissed the indictment in deference to the ruling in the Ballard case.

The Court: Just because there weren't women on the panel?

Mr. McDowell: There were no women permitted on the panel, they were intentionally excluded, your Honor.

The Court: Oh, intentionally excluded.

Mr. McDowell: In response to motions by the defendants for the return of their documents, which had been furnished [fol. 1503] during the grand jury proceeding, on the ground that, because of its illegal basis, the grand jury had no legal existence, and therefore the furnishing of the documents, or the obtaining of the documents, constituted an unreasonable search and seizure, the District Court directed that the documents and all copies be returned by the Government.

When the civil case came on for trial the District Court denied the Government's motion, subpoena, for the production of the documents on the ground that they had originally been illegally obtained and they could not be used. The action was dismissed then; the Government rested, unable to go forward without the documentary evidence. On appeal the Supreme Court held that the orders dismissing the indictment and requiring the return of the documents did not affect the Government's right to have the same documents produced in the civil proceedings. Your Honor has, of course, made a similar ruling in this case without that background.

But the Wallace & Tiernan case is significant here because it necessarily involved a recognition that the civil proceeding was based on information obtained through a grand jury investigation. That was the whole point of the case, the Government couldn't proceed when it couldn't [fol. 1504] get the information, couldn't have the use in the civil case of the information obtained through the grand jury.

So that that decision constitutes an approval, recognition of this policy, this practice, and an approval of the use of such information in a civil action.

Now, coming to the claim of privilege, your Honor, the plaintiff, as well as defendants, has cited a long list of cases which illustrate the development of the rule of secrecy and the development of the exception to the rule of secrecy.

The Court: In fact, I had that in law school, if my memory serves me correctly.

Mr. McDowell: In deference to your Honor's reminder of the rule, we do not propose to attempt to review that matter in any way; that situation is before the Court. May we merely note that these exceptional cases, involving partial, limited disclosure of grand jury transcripts, in criminal cases, for the most part, typically involve situations where the testimony before the grand jury is the direct and central issue of the case, such as perjury prosecution, or where a plea in bar is involved, or where the Government has, with the permission of the court, publicly used some portion of the transcript of grand jury testimony for impeachment or refreshment purposes.

It is from these cases that the defendants make the long jump to the conclusion that the court has exclusive control over grand jury transcripts for any purpose and may require their disclosure at its discretion to parties in civil as well as in criminal cases, over the objection of the Government. We submit that this conclusion cannot be justified in the absence of such a showing of abuse as would invoke the supervisory responsibility of the court over grand jury proceedings, or of an issue involving the constitutional rights of the defendants.

Plaintiff has not asserted, or does the Attorney General assert by the claim of privilege filed here, that the Government could or would refuse to produce transcripts for review by the Court or upon order by the Court for use by others in any matter involving the authority of the Court over the functioning of the grand jury, where the supervisory control of the Court—specifically expressed in Rule 6, the very rule which gives Government counsel the right to use that information—is involved. Plaintiff fully recognizes the judiciary's clear and paramount obligation over grand juries and their actions. Obviously, no claim of [fol. 1506] privilege could be asserted by the Executive which could thwart or hamper the court in the exercise of that responsibility.

However, the Executive has the obligation and duty to enforce the laws of the Nation and to preserve and protect the investigative means and techniques necessary to this end. Thus the Executive has an independent duty to see that nothing is done to injure or impair the grand jury system or its efficiency as an investigative means. We do not suggest that the Executive has any peculiar pre-eminence in this field over the court, we merely are of the opinion that the Executive shares with the court a responsibility for the protection and safeguarding of this vital institution.

In instances such as this, which do not involve the supervisory capacity or the jurisdiction of the Court over grand juries and their actions, the Attorney General may assert a privilege against their disclosure—that is, disclosure of transcripts of proceedings—to third parties when, in his opinion, such disclosure would interfere with the performance of his executive duty by impairing the usefulness of grand juries in law enforcement. And that is our situation here.

[fol. 1507] The right of the Executive to interpose objection is based upon the responsibility of the Executive to preserve the grand jury system as an investigative means in the enforcement of law and is a form of privilege more fundamental than one based upon the mere fact of custody. In fact, if the transcripts were impounded in the custody of the clerk of the court, the Attorney General still would have the right and obligation, in our view, to assert the privilege of grand jury secrecy.

By our motion for ruling on the claim of privilege, we ask that the Court accord respect and weight to this determination and this conclusion reached by the Attorney General. We recognize that the determination of the issue of privilege is, in the final analysis, one for the Court, as Professor Moore has pointed out in his treatise on Federal Practice, which has been cited.

And this brings us to the basic proposition, if the Court please, as we see it, that the Court in the exercise of its sound discretion should deny access to grand jury transcripts on the ground that the public interest would not best be served by their disclosure.

It is unnecessary, in our opinion, to review—and it would duplicate ground previously covered—the formation and history of public policy guaranteeing the secrecy of the [fol. 1508] grand jury investigation. With but one possible exception, which I would like to discuss briefly, the Grunstein case, all instances in which federal courts have ordered disclosure of grand jury testimony have been in the exercise of the Court's supervisory jurisdiction over grand juries, or in criminal cases where grand jury testimony is a direct and central issue, or where the Government and the Court have agreed that disclosure would be in the public interest. It is noteworthy that in none of such cases has there been permitted anything like the sweeping, complete disclosure of the transcript of an entire investigation, such as is contemplated here. And I have mentioned four cases—which previously have been called to the Court's attention—in which the courts have denied the very thing sought here—District Court decisions.

We do not believe that the Supreme Court intended in the Socony-Vacuum decision to announce a new exception to the rule of grand jury secrecy by stating that disclosure was wholly proper when required by the ends of justice after discharge of the grand jury. That decision merely approved a use of the grand jury transcripts, at the trial of the indictment, for impeachment or refreshment purposes. [fol. 1509]. Such use was, of course, already well established as one of the familiar exceptions to the rule of secrecy. Nothing in that decision touches upon the situation presented here.

May I say a word about the General Motors decision? The Court has questioned the pertinency of the ruling by Judge Leahy in that case. It is, of course, true that the opinion in that case relied mainly upon criminal cases. I don't believe there had been any civil cases presenting this issue before that decision.

The Court: Then he had to rely on criminal cases.

Mr. McDowell: But the reasons for protecting the secrecy of the grand jury process which motivated that opinion by Judge Leahy are just as applicable in civil as in criminal cases, that is, because it is the continuing secrecy of the grand jury process as an institution which is at stake, not any particular record of investigation.

The court in the Rose case, your Honor will recall, deemed the rule of secrecy to rest in part upon the public policy of encouraging free and full disclosure before grand juries, and raised this question of the danger to the functioning of the institution from release of grand jury transcripts, irrespective of what considerations and what [fol. 1510] reasons arising in a particular case might be argued against release in that case. So that it makes no difference as far as the harm to this public policy is concerned whether the secrecy is breached in a criminal or in a civil case.

So much for one point which your Honor has previously mentioned, with respect to the General Motors case, that is, it relied primarily upon criminal. The other point to which your Honor adverted was that it did not appear that any consideration had been given by Judge Leahy in that case to the use, or possible use, by the Government of the grand jury transcripts. With great deference may I say that we do not agree that that consideration was not present in the mind of Judge Leahy, as indicated by his opinion. If your Honor will permit me, I would like to read briefly from part of that opinion. And I quote—and this is 15 F.R.D., pages 487-488—I am sorry, your Honor, I am not certain now that this particular passage appears at 487-488, but as your Honor will recall, it is a very short opinion:

“It is argued the Department of Justice will have the transcripts of the grand jury available and may use them, and such, it is suggested, will be a tactical advantage the discovery rules were designed to eliminate. But defendant [fol. 1511] here has other discovery techniques at its disposal through which most of the information sought and clues to other possible sources may be obtained. . . . If a precedent is set that evidence before a grand jury may at some future date be disclosed to the probing examination of civil litigants in preparation of the trial of their cause not alone in a collateral matter but, as in the case at bar, in directly related matters where the inquisitorial examination of the grand jury and a civil litigant's discovery in preparation for trial encompass the same subject matter and include an identity of events, such precedent would tend to restrict the free function of the grand jury.”

Of course; it need hardly be urged, and I would merely advert briefly to the proposition, that grand juries often must seek information from persons whose testimony may well be inhibited by fear of prospective defendants should their testimony be disclosed. And that is not peculiar to cases involving racketeering or the more obvious forms of criminal violence—although that, too, occurs in antitrust cases. Sometimes we have racketeering cases, also, under the antitrust laws. But the economic pressure implicit in the good-will of an employer, or of those with whom the [fol. 1512] witnesses must do business, is peculiarly present in antitrust investigations. And that, I think, is obvious. Any suggestion that grand jury testimony may subsequently be disclosed, with full revelation of the transcript of the investigation, would increase the difficulty even now experienced in securing full, frank and free disclosure from witnesses before grand juries—the purpose cited in the Rose case and the Amazon case, and the other cases, as to the need for continuing secrecy, for maintaining continual secrecy of grand jury investigations.

Now, the Grunstein case, 137 Fed. Supp. 197, is the only case known to plaintiff where a Federal Judge has ruled that even limited access to grand jury transcripts must be allowed on motion of defendants under Rule 34. This decision was in a civil action under the False Claims Act.

May I say, your Honor, that one obvious distinction at the outset is that that case did not involve the endorsement of a policy such as involved in the Sherman Act, but was for the recovery of penalties provided in that Act.

The defendants in the civil case, after termination of the indictment proceedings, had moved to inspect and copy certain portions of grand jury minutes covering the testimony [fol. 1513] as to matters relevant to the civil action, of the nine defendants in the civil case, and of any other witnesses who were also to testify at the trial of the civil action. The Court ordered the production of the transcript of testimony. It should be noted that they were not produced.

The Grunstein case was argued here just before motions in this Procter & Gamble proceeding were argued. In the light of the consideration which was given to this question in connection with the motion in this case, the motion in this case and the companion proceedings in the oil case, where the question was up at that same time, the decision of Judge Hartshorne in the Grunstein case received serious consideration in the Department of Justice, and a rehearing was requested on additional grounds not presented in the original argument, and those were the grounds of privilege involved here, that is, the possible danger to the grand jury process, although no claim of privilege was filed in that case, your Honor. Judge Hartshorne stated that he would grant rehearing, but no rehearing was held because the case was disposed of by settlement prior to the date set.

It should be noted that that ruling did not go as far as your Honor has gone, it did not go as far as the ruling [fol. 1514] in this case because it authorized only limited disclosure. In fact, the Court—Judge Hartshorne, that is—pointed out the vice of an overall disclosure, and distinguished it. He stated that to reveal the testimony of a grand jury witness, other than a defendant or a witness at the trial would violate the traditional grand jury secrecy, with injurious consequences. He was assured, however, that each of the defendants in that case would take the stand to testify at the trial, each of them having been a grand jury witness, and that by so doing any possible claim of privilege on their part would be waived.

The Court reasoned that if a witness took the stand in the trial to testify concerning a particular transaction, his testimony would have to include all prior admissions concerning that transaction. Now, it appears that Judge Hartshorne may possibly have had some confusion there about the defendants' admissions and a witness's testimony. He uses the language "admissions" in referring to the testimony given before the grand jury, by the grand jury witnesses. And, of course, the ordinary witness before a grand jury doesn't make admissions, he testifies; he testifies in secret. I think that confusion arose from the fact that in the Grunstein case all of the defendants, all of the [fol. 1515] nine movants had been witnesses before the grand jury, and they were defendants in the civil proceeding. So that it may, quite properly, as he said there—their statements before the grand jury might be regarded as admissions. I don't think the point is very important, except it is a little bit curious, the reference to "admissions" by the grand jury witnesses.

Now, we submit that Judge Hartshorne looked only to the privilege of the witness—that was the matter, as I am informed, that was argued—overlooking the larger question, the greater privilege, posed by public policy.

But grand jury testimony, as we see it, or the disclosure of it, must be weighed by this larger policy and not in terms of the privilege, if any exists, of the individual witness.

Judge Hartshorne referred to the General Motors case, which he said was different because there the defendants had requested a “complete sweep” of the grand jury minutes. And, also, he distinguished the Metzler and Morgan cases on the grounds that the defendants were seeking too much.

We submit that this is a rather indefinite distinction, which Judge Hartshorne reached, based upon—if it is right [fol. 1516]—based upon limited disclosure in one civil case being right, whereas complete disclosure would be wrong. But we can concede—we do not say that there would not be circumstances under which some limited disclosure might be appropriate. I think the important thing is that his action there constitutes no precedent here, because, in fact, he actually distinguished the situation involved here and said that he would not grant such a sweeping disclosure as that which is involved in this case.

Furthermore, the decision is based on the fact that nine of the defendants were persons who testified before the grand jury. In the present case, not one witness before the grand jury is a defendant. It is true that some officers or employees of the defendants testified, but none of these are defendants. Defendants certainly cannot say in this case, as was said in the Grunstein case, that they will call as witnesses all of the grand jury witnesses, at least until they know what such witnesses will testify to. And if they know that, then, of course, what is the need for any grand jury transcript. So that we submit they cannot bring themselves within the rationale of the ruling in the Grunstein case.

The real question presented here, we submit, in the present [fol. 1517] posture of this case, upon the filing of the claim of privilege, is whether any necessity has been shown which would require a sweeping disclosure of grand jury minutes. That is the question before the Court. As the Supreme Court said in the Reynolds case, 345 U. S., at page 10—your Honor will recall that case—

The Court: That involved military secrets, didn't it, in a civil action? I think it was an airplane accident where somebody died.

Mr. McDowell: That was a claim under—

The Court: Federal Torts?

Mr. McDowell: —Federal Torts Act, where the Government had consented to be sued and had put itself in the position of any private litigant. There was no question of enforcement of governmental policy, or public policy; involving regulatory action, or anything of that kind involved. There was a difference in the nature of the claim of privilege in that there the claim of privilege was based upon military secrecy. But I think the parallel, in so far as the rationale of the decision, is very close; I believe the situations are identical.

If the Court will permit me, I would like to read one short excerpt from that decision. Your Honor will recall [fol. 1518] that it had been urged, in objection to the discovery sought there, of the report of investigation, that the plane carried military equipment of secret character, but no claim of privilege was filed at that time. The Supreme Court said, even with this information before it:

“... the trial court was in no position to decide that the matter was privileged until there had been a formal claim of privilege. Thus it was entirely proper to rule initially that petitioner had shown probable cause for discovery of the documents. Thereafter, when the formal claim of privilege was filed by the Secretary of the Air Force, under circumstances indicating a reasonable possibility that military secrets were involved, there was certainly a sufficient showing of privilege to cut off further demand for the document on the showing of necessity for its compulsion that had then been made.”

Thus emphasizing the distinction between the finding of good cause, or probable cause, sufficient to permit discovery in the ordinary case and the showing of necessity which the courts require where privilege is present.

Now, that brings me to a distinction which I think is important, which underlies this whole problem.

[fol. 1519] The Court: Just hold it a minute, please.

Is that criminal case ready now?

Mr. Del Tufo: Your Honor, it is, sir.

The Court: I have to take a pleading in a case.

Mr. McDowell: This is a good point to interrupt, your Honor.

The Court: And I think, for our purposes, we better adjourn for lunch now, because it is a quarter to 1, and be back here at 2 o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION

Mr. McDowell: May it please the Court, we had reached the crux of the problem here at the recess. This is a case in which a grand jury was empaneled in this district to investigate violations of the anti-trust laws. At the conclusion of the grand jury investigation the plaintiff, acting under statutory mandate, and in the exercise of a discretion which has been sanctioned by the Supreme Court, elected to bring a civil proceeding to prevent and restrain violations.

In a discovery action, on motions for production of transcripts of grand jury testimony, this Court, and quite properly, exercised its discretion under the Rules of Civil Discovery, and has found—although I do not wish to be taken as conceding that we would agree with the finding—that good cause was shown for the production of the transcripts of testimony taken before the grand jury.

The propriety of such a procedure was approved by the Supreme Court quite recently in the Reynolds case, the opinion in which, I may add, was written by then Chief Justice Vinson. And I looked it up, in view of the discussion earlier today. I note that Mr. Justice Black dissented in that case.

[fol. 1521] Now, there is no question but what the plaintiff—that is, the Government—acting in its sovereign, regulatory capacity, under the Sherman Act here, has had the use of information obtained through the grand jury investigation, both documentary and testimonial.

I may say, as an aside, that I have looked into that matter somewhat and I find that the documents were a much more important source of information than the testimony.

The Supreme Court has held in the Reynolds case that, however proper and correct the procedure followed here was upon the discovery motion, once a formal claim of privilege is filed then a new question is presented, and that is a question not of good cause but a question of necessity. And the Supreme Court stated in that ruling that the extent to which the District Court should probe in satisfying itself that the claim of privilege is appropriate is to be measured by the degree of necessity shown.

And that brings us to the question of what necessity has been shown or exists here. There is no question but that the defendants cannot obtain the exact verbatim text of statements made and questions asked before the grand jury in any other way than by gaining access to the grand jury transcripts. But what the defendants seek here is information [fol. 1522] tion; that is what they are entitled to, information, under the discovery rules. There is a distinction between information as such and the particular form in which it may be embodied. And upon that distinction, we submit, turns the resolution of the question here. That distinction was noted most recently in the Reynolds case, to which reference has been made; where the document involved was a report of investigation setting forth statements made by survivors after the crash of an Air Force plane. There, as here, there was no question but that the only conceivable way in which the parties could obtain the information in the particular form in which it had been embodied was by securing the verbatim text of those statements. But it was the information possessed by the survivors, just as here it is the information possessed by the grand jury witnesses, which was needed by the parties for the preparation of their case. That information, as Judge Medina noted in the Investment Bankers case, in colloquy with respect to this point in that case, had an independent existence prior to and independent of the grand jury proceedings, and the information as such gained no immunity by having been the subject of testimony or, as in the Investment Bankers case, in the particular aspect in which Judge [fol. 1523] Medina was discussing the matter, that is, in documentary form, by having been presented before a grand jury. That information was and is just as available to the defendants as to the Government through ordinary discovery procedures.

What the defendants here assert, in short, is not necessity, but convenience. I might note parenthetically, as I am sure the Court is well aware, that convenience itself does not constitute good cause. We have learned that lesson most recently, on the Government side, in the Shoe Machinery case where Judge Wyzanski denied the Government's request for lists of thousands of patents which had been issued to United and which had been compiled in accordance to the way in which the claims of the patents bore upon certain machines. Obviously, it was an enormous chore to analyze those patents and prepare duplicate lists, but nonetheless the Government was put to that burden because, as Judge Wyzanski noted, the information, which was what the Government sought, was already in its possession, or was available to it, through the Patent Office, and through study and examination.

So here, too, the defendants have conceded that they could [fol. 1524] obtain most, if not all, of the information put before the grand jury without seeing the grand jury transcripts. In the original motion filed by Procter on September 24, 1954, it is stated in paragraph (e)—and I quote—that “the names of most if not all of those who appeared and testified before the grand jury in connection with the investigation of the soap industry have been known for many months.”

In paragraph (f) it is simply asserted that “the information contained in the grand jury transcripts is necessary to Procter for an adequate preparation of its defenses to this action.”

Similar statements are contained in the Association motion.

The Court will note that it was the information contained in the transcripts which defendants urged as being necessary in the preparation of their defenses.

In the motion filed on behalf of Lever Brothers, the grounds given—ground 2 was that Lever Brothers “is urgently in need of access to such testimony in order to discover in this civil proceeding the evidentiary basis, if any, for the charges in the complaint”—the Court will note there it was the evidentiary basis, not the information, which Lever sought.

In the brief filed on behalf of Lever Brothers we find on [fol. 1525] page 5 the statement, "It is conceded by all that the defendants can now proceed to take the depositions of all witnesses before the grand jury and freely inquire into their testimony before that body."

And in the Colgate memorandum the witnesses are identified on page 2; 28 of the grand jury witnesses are identified according to their relationship to the defendants and to other companies. And on page 10 it is stated, "We could take the depositions of the witnesses whose names we know."

The Court: That presupposes that all those witnesses would remember what they said before the grand jury many years ago, is that right?

Mr. McDowell: Well, approximately three years as of the time of the earliest filing of this motion, two to three years ago, your Honor. But there is a point there that merits some consideration. It is apparent from the issues here that the conduct complained of, and which forms the basis of this civil action, goes back over a period of many years, so that the supposedly contemporaneous account which the Government has in the grand jury transcript, or has had access to, was in itself a very old account with respect to many, many of the transactions which, from an examination [fol. 1526] of the complaint, would necessarily go to the root of the issues involved here. So that we do not regard that as being a serious difference between the availability of the information to the defendants and its availability to the Government.

The Court: Well, suppose that one of the witnesses who testified before the grand jury was brought in for deposition by one of the defendants and that witness were to say, "Well, I am sorry, General Royall, but do you expect me to remember what I said before that grand jury? I haven't the least idea what I said." Do you think it would be proper then to release the transcript of that witness's testimony for the witness's refreshment of his memory?

Mr. McDowell: No, we would not agree with that, your Honor. It is not a question of what the witness said before the grand jury, it is a question of the witness's knowledge about pertinent transactions. Of course, it would be impossible for the ordinary witness to recall, even two years later, precisely and exactly the form in which he had stated any knowledge he might have.

The Court: I mean substantially what he said. We have that in trial court every day. A witness says, "Well, your Honor, do you expect me to remember what I said three [fol. 1527] years ago?" Then you say, "Well, give us substantially what you said."

Mr. McDowell: That is exactly the point here, your Honor. The witness's knowledge of the transaction—certainly if it is an important enough transaction to be evidence—the witness's knowledge of the transaction, we contend, would not evaporate overnight, the way his recollection of the precise words he used would. But it is that knowledge, it is that information, to which the defendants are entitled. And it is that information, we submit, they could obtain through questioning of witnesses, interviewing of witnesses, and taking depositions.

It is pertinent, I think, to note that in the identification written by Colgate—18 of the 28 witnesses are identified as having been, either currently or formerly, officers or employees of the defendants.

The Court: Will you hold it a minute? If my memory serves me correctly—you see, you live with this case, I take it; I would hate to tell you the number of cases I have tried while I was preparing this opinion and since I completed it, and the number of motions—didn't I say something in that opinion to the effect that if they could get evidence by other pretrial discovery means they should get it that way?

[fol. 1528] Mr. McDowell: I don't recall that, your Honor.

The Court: Well, I am pretty sure I said it somewhere in there.

Mr. McDowell: The record is barren here of any showing that the defendants—even of any assertion—that the defendants are unable to find or interview any witness who appeared before the grand jury—with respect to one witness, since deceased. There is no showing that the defendants have not already interviewed such witnesses fully with respect to these matters. Is there any doubt but that they interviewed at least their own officers and employees concurrently with the grand jury investigation? Is there any showing that any witness who appeared before the grand jury has refused to talk to them, or cannot recall the subject matter of his testimony?

It has been suggested by Procter in its supplemental brief that unless the defendants have the transcripts their officers may be charged with making inconsistent statements in subsequent testimony. This is merely and purely an effort to avoid possible impeachment. Is this the showing laid down in the Socony-Vacuum case, that the ends of justice require disclosure?

At the prior argument, as I recall, counsel deprecated [fol. 1529] this question of possible impeachment. I know it doesn't loom large in the thinking of this Court, from the remarks your Honor made, yet the fact remains implicit and inherent that any transcript, no matter when taken, or however much time has elapsed, can readily be utilized by prospective witnesses to guide, to direct, and to limit their testimony at the time of trial. Such discovery, not only to find out what the Government had for its case in chief, but also what material it might have for impeachment, was sought in the Schneiderman case, which has been referred to in our earlier brief. I did not, however, in that brief quote this statement made by Judge Mathes in deciding that case:

"Writings relating to possible . . . impeachment are essentially in an area where the surprise element is unavoidable; and moreover desirable as a force tending to keep all sides within the narrow confines of the truth."

We would agree that witnesses called from the defendants' ranks—that is, their officers and employees—would not likely be subject to any impeachment.

Were the Government's case to rest solely on the testimony of such witnesses, we would not labor the subject. [fol. 1530] But it does not. The majority of the witnesses called will not fall within that classification. The Government must rely, in part, on testimony of persons not connected with the defendants at the time their testimony was given, some of whom may be dependent on defendants' good-will for their economic welfare.

It would only be human nature for such a person to want to cooperate with defendants, and to dull any testimony adverse to them, and he could certainly accomplish this with much greater ease by a perusal of the transcript.

Such a shift or supplementation, or, perhaps more accurately, a change of climate in the attitude of the witness, would not aid in the ascertainment of the truth.

Plaintiff submits that defendants, from their own records and from the present recollection of their officials, together with their past interviews, can secure a complete and comprehensive statement with respect to all the matters involved in the issues presented here without any encroachment upon the historical secrecy of the grand jury proceeding. The defendants have made no showing that they are unable to do so.

Now, the defendants will have a list of all witnesses. There is nothing to prevent them from asking each of those [fol. 1531] witnesses what he knows about the industry and the subject matter of his testimony before the grand jury. No reason has been advanced why this procedure would not be satisfactory here.

It appears that the defendants already know the identity of, as they say, "most, if not all" of the witnesses.

Lest there be any doubt whatever on this point, I have been authorized by the Attorney General to furnish the defendants with a complete list of such witnesses, and plaintiff will not object to the entry of an order directing that such a list be supplied. There will then be no question concerning the fact that the alternatives open to the defendants, of interviewing or taking the depositions of such witnesses, will not be hindered by any uncertainty as to who appeared before the grand jury, or any difficulty in locating grand jury witnesses.

Can it be said under all these circumstances that necessity has been shown, or that there is not a practicable alternative available to the defendants for securing the information which they may require? Certainly the inconvenience of taking depositions could not be eliminated by turning over transcripts of the grand jury investigation. Irrespective of what the defendants may do, plaintiff will be required to take substantial number of depositions. It [fol. 1532] is a complete mistake to think, as the defendants' argument seems to suggest, that all of the Government's evidence is contained in the grand jury transcripts and that this case could readily and quickly be disposed of on the record of the grand jury proceeding. The substantial requests for documentary discovery made by the Government have already given some indication of the additional scope of the issues.

Under these circumstances, we are in precisely the situation described by the Supreme Court in the Reynolds case. The Court stated, and I quote from page 11:

"Here, necessity was greatly minimized by an available alternative,"—this was after the filing of the formal claim of privilege and after the court had discussed how the question then became one of necessity—"which might have given respondents the evidence to make out their case without forcing a showdown on the claim of privilege. By their failure to pursue that alternative, respondents have posed the privilege question for decision with the formal claim of privilege set against a dubious showing of necessity."

May I, with some diffidence, and at the risk of trying the Court's already generous patience, say a word about the subject of fairness, which has been discussed here at some [fol. 1533] length?

There is admittedly considerable appeal in the argument that it is unfair for the Government to have the use of information not available to the defendants, as the defendants imply. If this were the case, we would indeed have a difficult question before us. But that is not the case here. That argument implies too much. I think it is pertinent to note, because of the felicitous turn of language involved, the statement of the Supreme Court with respect to an analogous contention in the Wallace & Tiernan case, which turned upon the illegality of the grand jury, and the argument that therefore the Government might not have the use of any information which it had obtained during the course of the grand jury investigation. The Supreme Court said with respect to that, and I quote from page 799:

"This argument has a superficial plausibility on the word level, but if our attention is directed to the substance rather than symbols the speciousness of the argument is exposed."

So here is the information which the defendants seek and there is no showing that that information is not available to the defendants. If the Government did, in fact, have information which it claimed the exclusive right to use, then the defendants' argument would have some merit. [fol. 1534] But it is only the transcripts of the grand jury proceeding to which the Government claims an exclusive right.

Indeed, the information and facts which form the subject matter of the grand jury investigation were and are peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants. It was an investigation of the soap industry, the household soap industry. And when you say the household soap industry, and for all practical purposes you say Procter, Lever and Colgate, under our allegations as to the overwhelming percentage of business done in the industry which is done respectively by those three companies.

Those facts within their knowledge, as to their conduct, gain no immunity by becoming the subject of grand jury testimony. In short, it is necessary to distinguish, as Judge Medina did in the Investment Bankers case, between the privileged character of testimony, which has no existence apart from the grand jury, and the non-privileged character of facts which existed prior to and independently of the grand jury investigation, and which are capable of being ascertained in evidence other than through transcripts of grand jury testimony.

It is clear that what the defendants seek here is not [fol. 1535] information concerning relevant facts, but rather to be informed as to precisely what information the Government acquired during the grand jury investigation.

If I may be permitted to paraphrase the defendants' argument with respect to fairness, in terms of the realities of the situation here, the argument is that it is unfair for the Government to have acquired information concerning the defendants' conduct, and to be free to use that information in this proceeding, without disclosing to the defendants, not merely the substance of the information—as, indeed, the Government has already done in response to the several hundred questions which we answered in the course of the discovery proceedings—but, in addition, the verbatim transcript of the grand jury testimony through which the Government acquired such information. But if there was no abuse of the grand jury process, and the Court's opinion of April 17th states that the legality of the procedure followed here is not in issue, would not the defendants' argument, if accepted, logically require that not only the information obtained through grand jury investigation, but also information obtained by the Government through other investigative means, including FBI reports, be furnished to the defendants in verbatim form?

[fol. 1536] Let us put the shoe on the other foot. Undoubtedly, during the period of the grand jury investigation there were two investigations being conducted simultaneously, one by the Government, with the grand jury, and one by the defendants. Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that most of the witnesses who appeared before the grand jury—and the defendants' briefs indicate that they were well known to the defendants—were questioned by counsel for the defendants, as well as by the grand jury. It is customary for counsel to make a written record, in the form of notes and memoranda, of the facts ascertained in this fashion in preparation for possible litigation. It is reasonable to believe that the record of the investigation conducted by counsel for the defendants contains information additional to that contained in the record of the grand jury investigation. It is fair, if the Government is compelled to turn over the record of the grand jury investigation to defendants, that the defendants should have the use in this proceeding of their own record of investigation without such record being made available to the Government? If we were to apply the liberal policy of the discovery rules without recognition of the public policy and public interest underlying the [fol. 1537] limitations which are imposed, it would of course follow that all information gathered by both sides should be subject to pretrial disclosure.

The Court: But you are afraid the defendants will invoke Hickman v. Taylor?

Mr. McDowell: Yes, your Honor.

The Court: Work product?

Mr. McDowell: Yes, your Honor. And in that case, 392 U. S. 495, the Supreme Court held that public policy imposes limits on discovery and prevents just that kind of discovery even in the absence of any formally recognizable privilege.

And that language, I may say, your Honor, is quoted in the brief which the Government had submitted earlier. It is very interesting to note that the Court did not place its ruling upon some specifically definable privilege but rather on the fundamental underlying public policy governing our system of litigation. If fairness is to be the test here, let us frankly recognize that the advantage is all on the side of the defendants, so far as knowledge of the facts is concerned, since it is their conduct that is in issue and they are, of course, in possession of full knowledge with respect to the conduct.

In summary, Your Honor, we think this situation falls [fol. 1538] squarely within the procedure in the situation which was described by the Supreme Court in the Reynolds case, and that is—may I quote briefly from page 11:

“In each case the showing of necessity which is made will determine how far the court should probe in satisfying itself that the occasion for invoking the privilege is appropriate. Where there is a strong showing of necessity, the claim of privilege, made under the circumstances of this case, will have to prevail.”

We feel very strongly that in the absence either of such a showing of necessity, or of some abuse, some showing of abuse, sufficient to invoke the supervisory responsibility of the court over the conduct of the grand jury, the state's interest in preserving the integrity of the grand jury system is superior to the convenience of the parties, superior to the interests of any individual litigant or witness, superior to any individual case, including this case. We believe that it is the right and duty of the Attorney General to assert and advocate this public interest. The defendants cannot be expected to do so, and the Court cannot be expected to advocate it, for it is for the judge to weigh the merits of the different contentions and decide. [fol. 1539] The basic objection lies in the fact that disclosure of the minutes of an entire grand jury investigation would constitute a notice to future witnesses, not merely in antitrust investigations, that their testimony may be disclosed at some future time, wholesale and complete. The effects of such a notice—upon witnesses in future investigations—and upon grand jurors, too, if full disclosure of the entire proceedings of a grand jury, apart from deliberations, is contemplated.

The Court: You mean how they voted on a particular matter?

Mr. McDowell: No, apart from deliberations. But if the entire record of what was put before them is to be disclosed.

The question was raised as to whether or not this proposal ~~does~~ not contravene equally fundamental considerations for the protection of the grand jury system noted in the Rose case, another decision. Having due regard for the uncertainties of life, many witnesses would realize that their relationship to those under investigation, either then or at some future time, might subject them to retaliation or disfavor for any unfriendly or disloyal statements, and they would be likely to speak less frankly and fully.

[fol. 1540] We submit that what is proposed here is not merely the application of the presently recognized exception which permits limited disclosure of specific grand jury testimony in exceptional cases and under the compulsion of necessity, but rather a new and sweeping exception for discovery purposes. Any such change should be very carefully weighed if there exists the slightest possibility of an adverse effect upon the ability of future grand juries to hear the full truth. The Government and the Court have each the duty of protecting the integrity of the grand jury system and of protecting grand jury witnesses in that confidence which society has considered necessary to encourage witnesses to speak fully, freely and honestly.

Thank you.

STATEMENT BY MR. CORREA

Mr. Correa: If your Honor please, the temptation to make reply to the argument of counsel for the Government, which is so answerable in so many aspects, is almost irresistible. But one has to keep in mind your Honor's original admonition at the outset of this hearing this morning when your Honor pointed out that this was rehearing. And as I understood the Court's definition of rehearing or reargument—and it coincides or accords with what I had always understood to be the function of reargument—reargument is not for the purpose of repeating [fol. 1541] and reiterating arguments which have already been made, and on the basis of which decisions have been taken by the courts. Rearguments, as I understand it, are for the purpose of calling to the Court's attention some new matter of fact or law which might conceivably affect the decision already rendered and cause the Court to perhaps reach a different decision.

Now, I have listened patiently and carefully, I have made many notes here, and I have followed Mr. McDowell's presentation in his own briefs, as well as in the minutes of our prior argument, and I find absolutely nothing that is new, that hasn't been fully argued to your Honor orally, or briefed by us, or our co-defendants, or by the Government, which hasn't been called to your Honor's attention well before the decision of this matter.

So that therefore, your Honor, with some reluctance, I must confess, because it is hard to resist the opportunity, but still in justice to the Court, and out of consideration for the points, or the matters which your Honor raised about wasting your Honor's time, these gentlemen's time, and this lady's, or our own time, we have decided—and I am authorized, I believe, to speak for my colleagues—to make no further argument, or to repeat the arguments we [fol. 1542] have heretofore made, save on any aspect of the matter which your Honor may wish us to address ourselves to specifically.

The Court: I am glad you feel that way about it. And I guess you know by the question I put to Mr. McDowell what really is bothering me now. It was not my intention, of course, to turn over the grand jury minutes to the defendants for the purpose of convenience. My purpose was to turn them over in the true spirit of the discovery rules of federal civil procedure. One of them, of course, is that you can get the information yourself, by other means available, you can't have the grand jury minutes, you realize that.

Mr. Correa: Certainly, if there were other practical means, if your Honor please. But "other means" does not mean any possible means, it means other means that are practicable and reasonably to be followed. And there are no such other means here, if your Honor please.

The Court: Well, suppose, as the Government has already intimated—that is, the Department of Justice—they are willing to give you the names of all the witnesses who testified before them? And many of them are employees of yours, or one of the co-defendants, whom you can get the information from. Then what?

[fol. 1543] Mr. Correa: Well, as your Honor has pointed out, the considerations are precisely the considerations that your Honor has emphasized. As your Honor knows from your own practice, you can get a man five minutes after he comes out of the grand jury room, and have him sit down and dictate to a stenographer his best recollection of everything that went on and it will still vary widely from what actually happened. And that is the normal fallibility of human recollection and there is no adequate substitute in this case. Further than that, the makeshift substitute—because that is all it would be—would be dreadfully makeshift, because we have the name of John Doe, let's say, and he is a witness and was a witness before the grand jury, and we can go find John Doe and examine him. On what? Every issue that you could conceivably raise under the antitrust laws, or at least under that part of them pertaining to the Sherman Act. Because if you read that complaint—or, as your Honor has read this complaint, your Honor appreciates that the complaint here raises every possible issue on every aspect of the defendants' business—their buying, their selling; their advertising, their pricing, their sales promotion, just everything they do, across the board. Now, did John Doe testify on one narrow aspect of this, or on all of them, or on half a [fol. 1544] dozen of them, or are we going to sit with John Doe for hours and days on end, and then with whatever number of John Does there are for hours and days on end, in distant parts of the country, and all this could be obviated? I don't think the rules of civil procedure were intended to require resort to that kind of proceeding, especially in view of the fact that when you get all done, for the reason your Honor has mentioned, and the reason we have mentioned, you are never going to get the thing that you really want and that you are entitled to, and that is what the man's recollection was, and what he testified to at the time he gave his testimony actually in the grand jury room. You will never get that, in most cases.

The Court: But the cases do hold that if you can obtain the information yourself you are supposed to get it, aren't you?

Mr. Correa: If you can, yes, if your Honor please. But here there is no workable alternative. We have explored that thoroughly and there just isn't any workable alternative.

The Court: You see, I can appreciate this, Mr. Correa, in the case where a man might be before the grand jury a whole day, you can't expect the gentleman to tell you what he testified to for a whole day before a federal grand [fol. 1545] jury, or any other grand jury. You know, yourself, where lawyers forget tomorrow what they said the day before the trial of a case, and then they rag the witness because he can't remember what he said four years ago. I realize that and I had that in mind. I had many things in mind while I was writing this opinion, particularly since for seven years I presented cases to the grand jury in a metropolitan county, and I probably know more about the problems of the grand jurors from personal contact than a lot of lawyers do academically.

Mr. Correa: I spent five years at it, if your Honor please.

The Court: You know what I am talking about. I could have a witness testify this week, and I would call him the next week on the same subject and he would give me a totally different story, and if I called him the next week he would give me another story, a third version of what happened. And I experimented many times in that regard, so I could see how witnesses' minds operate. And I used to say to myself, "Now, imagine this man being under cross-examination. Here he is with a friendly prosecutor, just trying to elicit information, and he gets mixed up and excited." What would he do with a good lawyer like you cross-examining him? He would be sorry he [fol. 1546] ever saw the thing, or ever heard about it, which is the attitude of most witnesses, anyway.

Mr. Correa: If your Honor please, I have had the opportunity, years ago, in the Louis Lieb disbarment of comparing the actual grand jury transcripts with a series of memoranda made by a very experienced lawyer of many years practice, and these memoranda were made by this lawyer immediately after he came out of the grand jury, went right down to his office and dictated a memorandum for the benefit of his advisers, his lawyers, and, believe me, there was a world of difference between the two. Now, this wasn't any ordinary witness, this was a man who you would expect, if anybody could render accurately what had transpired, would be the best bet to do it.

The Court: Yes. Well, the only reason I bring this up, I will tell you frankly—you know, I am a very blunt man and I think out loud—when I was writing this opinion many things were going through my mind, of the possible consequences of what I was going to determine. But I knew there were higher courts than me, maybe much wiser judges, brilliant jurists, who might disagree with Judge Modarelli about the situation. It was not my intention, of course, to tear the curtain right off the grand jury for any purpose. [fol. 1547] I thought that my opinion was very careful, and I was only judging the facts in this case, and this type of litigation. That is all.

Mr. Correa: Your Honor, I was struck by counsel's argument, that whenever he referred to any of the precedents, particularly those in our favor, they had to be held down very narrowly to the precise situation before the Court. But when he talks about your decision—

The Court: Yes, and if you were on the other side you would talk just like Mr. McDowell and if Mr. McDowell was on your side he would talk like you. I have learned that as a Judge a long time ago. I have seen these government men when they represent the Government and then three years later they come in representing a private litigant, and what a change in philosophy. It's incredible. I was young then, I didn't know any better. But they argued just as vociferously as they did later on a counter proposition. That doesn't overwhelm me.

Mr. Correa: But I wish merely to point out, when counsel talks of your decision he speaks of it as if it were the broadest possible application, and applied to cases under the Internal Security Act, the Subversive Activities Control Board, we got into racketeering, we were in proposed—not even actual, but proposed civil rights legislation, and all kinds of fields, which, to my mind, have no conceivable relation to anything that is before the Court here. This is plainly a decision tailored, as your Honor has so plainly put it, to the needs of the Big Case, the big antitrust case, in an antitrust case where the Department of Justice has done what the head of their antitrust division has said in sworn testimony before a congressional committee it is their practice to do, that is, use the grand jury for the purpose of pretrial, precomplaint investigation and preparation of their case. And indeed, in the excerpt from his testimony, which your Honor quotes in one of the footnotes to your opinion, your Honor will recall, he equates—investigation by the process of the grand jury on the one hand, and filing a complaint and investigating under the rules, under the civil rules on the other; he equates them, he says: These two, plus voluntary cooperation of the defendant, are the three ways in which we investigate a civil case. That is what this case is all about. We are not talking here about the Subversive Activities Control Board, or racketeering statutes, or any of these other things.

[fol. 1549] The Court: Is there anything else you should answer, raised by Mr. McDowell, if he did raise anything new?

Mr. Correa: Well, if your Honor please, sure, there are many things that should have been answered and have been answered. Now, I am willing to go back over any parts of the argument—

The Court: I don't want you to go over anything.

Mr. Correa: —that your Honor thinks he would like to have your recollection refreshed concerning.

The Court: Well, did you get the impression from my opinion that I was just going to throw upon the entire grand jury proceedings to you in this suit?

Mr. Correa: I got the impression, if your Honor please, that we were to have the transcript of the testimony of witnesses.

The Court: Of all the witnesses who appeared before the grand jury in connection with this case, is that right?

Mr. Correa: That's right, if your Honor please.

The Court: And without any safeguards of any kind attached to that, in consideration of the public policy that may be involved?

Mr. Correa: Well, I certainly thought your Honor had considered the considerations of public policy—you very [fol. 1550] carefully discussed them—and, in my own humble opinion, had come out with what I regarded as the correct conclusion.

The Court: Well, of course, the side that prevails has always said that, you know. The side that doesn't prevail thinks the Judge doesn't know his business.

Mr. Correa: Well, if I may be permitted to express a personal opinion, as one who has had some experience prosecuting cases before grand juries, and has been chargeable with the prosecution of crime in a neighboring district; that I still think it is the right result, in this kind of case, because if the Department of Justice is going to use the grand jury as an adjunct to the preparation of civil cases; then the principles that the Supreme Court of the United States has laid down for the trial of civil actions in the courts of the United States ought to apply. To my mind, it is as simple as that. And they are using them, using the grand jury in that way. They stated it; they say there is nothing wrong with it. Maybe there isn't anything wrong with it.

The Court: Maybe there is no other way they can do it, either.

Mr. Correa: Maybe that is so. That has certainly been [fol. 1551] the testimony of various heads of the antitrust division. And they have asked for alternative ways and have up to now always been unsuccessful in getting them from Congress. But the point is, if they are going to use them, then this ought to be treated as a proceeding in a civil case and the rules, as your Honor has pointed out, whatever the law was before 1938, in 1938—and it was quite different, as your Honor recalls—in 1938 the Supreme Court said, "We are not going to do it on a trial by battle basis any more, and the fellow who can hide something to the last minute, and then surprise his adversary and catch him flatfooted in the middle of a trial prevail." The Supreme Court said everybody gives up everything, in effect. And we have been operating under those ground rules ever since. And the Government is no exception.

The Court: Disgorge is the term they use.

Mr. Correa: Disgorge, precisely.

The Court: Even if your client thinks you are selling him out, you have to give all the information.

Mr. Correa: You have got to do it.

If there is any other aspect of the case, if your Honor please, to which you would care to have us address ourselves—have me address myself, or my colleagues—we would be glad to do it. But, as I say, it is repetition.

[Vol. 1552] The Court: I don't want you to repeat.

Mr. Correa: The business of the Reynolds case, which is a state secret case—

The Court: I considered the Reynolds case, and I didn't even mention it in the opinion, because I didn't see what it had to do with what I was deciding here. I didn't even mention it. I didn't see what it had to do with discovery proceedings.

Mr. Correa: I don't believe it has anything to do with our question here, if your Honor please.

The Court: If any questions arise in my mind I shall probably address a letter to you, because I will have to have what the Assistant Attorney General argued this morning transcribed. If I have any questions that I want answers to from you gentlemen I will write you a little note, and you will get a copy of it.

Mr. Correa: Thank you, your Honor.

COLLOQUY

Mr. McDowell: May I say two or three words more, your Honor?

The Court: Well, let's see whether the defendants want to say anything first in answer to what you said.

Mr. Fargas: If your Honor please, I don't think any purpose would be served by my addressing myself to the argument of Government counsel. I followed it with the [Vol. 1553] greatest care. Before coming to the courtroom today I started to make a list of the points in the previous papers in which the Government had previously made all of the arguments that they listed in the papers that they filed in connection with this so-called claim of privilege. The list is quite formidable, quite long. They have all been before your Honor. Your Honor's opinion makes it very clear that your Honor's decision is based on the narrow circumstances of this case. Your Honor has made it abundantly clear that this is an opinion that is fitted into the framework and the necessities of this Big Case.

As I listened to Mr. McDowell's very general statements about depositions here of all of these witnesses I confess that I had a sense of shock and wondered whether this was slightly argumentative because I am sure that if you begin appraising those remarks we would have before us the prospect of ten years of inadequate, unrewarding procedure, which is just exactly what your Honor has tried to avoid from the very first day this case came before you.

Thank you.

The Court: I am glad you understand my motives, Mr. Fortas.

Mr. Fortas: You made it perfectly clear in your opinion. [fol. 1554] The Court: In other words, I don't want to make a burdensome Big case more burdensome for anybody. It is bad enough at its best, in plain English, whether you represent the Government or the defendants.

Mr. Fortas: These arguments that the Government has made here are exactly the arguments they made during all the years when they refused to allow access to grand jury testimony to a fellow who was on trial for perjury because of what he said in the grand jury itself, and it took a court decision to make them change that position. And meanwhile they were shouting to the high heavens that the Government will come to an end, our system of justice will be terminated, and that this will be such a terrible precedent that nobody can see anything except disaster at the end of the road.

The Court: I have made that speech many times.

Mr. Fortas: Yes, sir; so have I.

The Court: And all those horrible consequences that were going to come from decisions made by judges never came to pass yet. All these calamities that were going to come, they don't seem to come.

General Royall, is there anything that impresses you that you think you should comment on, that Mr. McDowell raised that you think he has not raised hereto?

[fol. 1555] Mr. Royall: Well, I am sure there is nothing he has not raised before. I have been following it very closely, along with my colleagues, to see if there were any new matters, and it was our mutual decision that the matter has been covered both by previous arguments on both sides, briefed and re-briefed, and that your Honor has given it careful and painstaking consideration, that you had dealt with every facet of his discussion and had disposed of it. We didn't oppose him asking for a rehearing, or rearguing. We listened to see if there were any new thoughts. The only thing that has given me any pause to say anything is the fact that your Honor seemed to think there might be some substitute for the grand jury, but that was clarified in your Honor's opinion. The Government was the first to ask for and obtain—to obtain by process the evidence of the witnesses. They thought it was necessary. They used it to bring the case, and to prepare the case, as well as the other documents, and got the advantage of it.

Your Honor simply said, in your opinion, that the matter having been put in the civil field—and I add to that, at the instance of the Government—the rules require that we have the same information. We are entitled merely, your Honor, to what we would get in a regular case. There is [fol. 1556] no more violation possible of the secrecy of the grand jury in what we desire, not as much, as in what they have already done—the Government has. I am not arguing that they shouldn't, but they are the ones that chose that method of preparation, the grand jury—five years ago, your Honor. And without the same testimony they have we would be at a disadvantage.

And, as Mr. Fortas so tellingly said, I can think of few things that would complicate and prolong this case more than to seek a substitute for the simple evidence that the Government itself has used!

We get that and this case ought to be simplified more than by any single factor that I know. And I don't want to argue it any further.

Mr. Welch: Your Honor, just for the purpose of the record, on behalf of the Association I would like to announce that we are in thorough accord with the position taken by the manufacturing defendants.

Mr. Royall: Your Honor, I will ask this, that if any new points are now to be made, I may want to answer them, if Mr. McDowell is going to make any other points. If he confines himself to those, we have already answered.

Mr. McDowell: It seemed to me, your Honor, that counsel hesitated a bit when the Court asked him whether counsel [fol. 1557] had gotten the impression that your opinion proposed a sweeping disclosure of the transcripts of this grand jury investigation without any safeguards of any kind. That is precisely the way we view your Honor's opinion. And I may say that it would appear from the order which they drafted that the defendants viewed it in exactly that same light. I might quote the order. It requires that the plaintiff "within thirty days from the entry of this order produce at the offices of the Department of Justice, Washington, D. C., or such other place as the parties may agree, and permit Procter or its counsel to inspect and copy by photostating or other means all or any part of the transcript of the testimony of all witnesses who appeared before the said grand jury."

There is nothing said about any safeguards or limitations of any kind.

The Court: Well, I made no assertions, I only asked questions to see what you all thought I meant by my opinion. I know what I thought I meant. I haven't said it yet here, but when the order is submitted you will know what I really meant.

Do you have a counter order to offer?

Mr. McDowell: No, sir. We have given no consideration to the order yet.

[fol. 1558] The Court: Because it might be interesting to see what kind of an order you would submit. You apparently don't like the one the defendants have submitted, because you think it is too sweeping. Now, let's see what you would submit.

Mr. McDowell: Well, we felt it unnecessary to cross that bridge before we came to it. There is now here before the Court not reargument of the original motion, but a motion for a ruling on a formal claim of privilege and for reconsideration in the light of that claim.

And I regret very much that I have apparently failed to indicate the bearing which the Reynolds case has on our situation here because, as we understand it, the Reynolds case is squarely in point. It was in the Reynolds case that the Supreme Court stated the procedure which would be appropriate after the trial court has originally found good cause on a discovery situation, even though the possibility of disclosure of military secrets was argued—the court, then when a claim a privilege was filed the Supreme Court said it becomes incumbent upon the court too to weigh a showing not merely of good cause but of necessity for the production of the precise document as against the appropriateness of invoking the claim of privilege.

[fol. 1559] The Court: Mr. McDowell, can I impress upon you that when I wrote this opinion I had one type of litigation in mind—an antitrust suit. I am not worrying about a suit involving an Air Force plane, I am thinking about an antitrust suit, something that is tailored for antitrust suits alone, unless we are going to live a lifetime in trying one a generation.

Mr. McDowell: Your Honor, we would take a less serious view of this matter if we thought that the result of any ruling that the transcript of a grand jury investigation is to be disclosed could be limited to antitrust situations.

The Court: Well, if somebody tries it in another situation, and another judge agrees with me, we can't all be wrong. And if—God permitting—the Circuit Court would agree with me and the Supreme Court would agree with me, then I am not wrong.

Mr. McDowell: Quite true, your Honor.

The Court: I am not the final authority on whether this is the right procedure or not. I think, conscientiously and honestly, that in this type of case this is a proper procedure. And I concede that some other jurists might disagree with me violently. And that doesn't bother me. The Supreme Court disagrees five to four more often than not, and one vote decides what is the law of the land. And [L. 1560] that one vote that decides it might be dead-on, but that decides it, five to four. I am not stubborn enough to say that no other judge might disagree with me.

 I may, unquestionably, and maybe also give good philosophy why he thinks I am wrong—that even in the long run, let it be longer. Let justice prevail, even though the heavens fall. As I said this morning, if the heavens fall, I don't have to worry about justice, because the earth will disappear. We don't have to worry any more once the heavens fall, that is the end of the earth.

Mr. McDowell: Your Honor, we pointed out that other courts have disagreed. We recognize, of course, that your Honor must reach his own decision. But we would be derelict if we did not point out—

The Court: Don't you get the impression that I resent the fact that you are pointing things out to me. That is my sworn duty.

Mr. McDowell: And we would be derelict if we did not bring to your Honor's attention the statements made by the Supreme Court in the Reynolds case, particularly in view of the close parallel where the court pointed to the fact that the defendants, having the names of the survivors listed, of course, take their depositions or interview them and obtain the necessary information, or at least there [L. 1561] was no showing, as distinguished from argument, that they could not so obtain the necessary information.

The Court: Now, that was one plane, wasn't it; one plane involved?

Mr. McDowell: Yes, sir. And here is a grand jury with 20 or 30 witnesses, 18 of whom were officers or employees of the defendants; and the others of whom, with perhaps one or two exceptions, are people who do business regularly with the defendants. So that the situation is not so vastly different.

The Court: Then why does it take so long to get an antitrust suit to issue, and why does it take so long to try an anti-trust suit, if there are only 28 or 35, or 40 witnesses involved? They go on for months, months and months. I read in one trial how many children were born of the lawyers involved in the suit, how many died while the suit was pending—I recall that distinctly. Then why does it take so long, if there are so few witnesses?

Mr. McDowell: I don't think it follows, your Honor, that there would be only 28 or 30 witnesses at the trial of the case.

One additional point which I think must be emphasized because it has come up again in this colloquy between the [fol. 1562] Court and counsel. I think it is unfortunate if this case should be decided on a false premise, and I submit it is a false premise to view the grand jury investigation here, as it has been repeatedly referred to, as an action by the Government, a device used by the Government for the sole purpose of obtaining information for a civil action. Ever since the Standard Sanitary case, where the Supreme Court confirmed the exercise of the Government's discretion, it has been practice to use grand juries to investigate violations of the Sherman Act.

The Court: I know that.

Mr. McDowell: And the government has quite properly had the election under the statute of determining at the conclusion of such an investigation whether to bring a civil action or to ask for an indictment, or perhaps proceed in both ways.

Here there is an affidavit on file with the Court by counsel that this proceeding was instituted for the purpose of investigating violations. And I think it would be unfortunate if we were to have any countenance given to the suggestion that the Government has deliberately abused the grand jury process for the sole purpose of obtaining facts and information for civil action.

The Court: Did the Supreme Court say it's all right?

[fol. 1563] Mr. McDowell: The Supreme Court said in the —there are two decisions by the Supreme Court.

The Court: That it is proper?

Mr. McDowell: The Supreme Court said in the Standard Sanitary case—

The Court: Did they say it is proper to do it?

Mr. McDowell: It is proper for the Government to have an election as to what procedure to follow.

The Court: That settles it then. Who am I to question that?

Mr. McDowell: And the Supreme Court said in the Walce & Tiernan case that the mere fact that the grand jury—that the information had been obtained through even an illegally constituted grand jury could not prevent the Government from having the use of that information in a civil proceeding.

The Court: That settles that, even an illegally constituted grand jury.

Mr. McDowell: Your Honor, one word about the Rules of Civil Procedure.

The Court: Yes, I would like to hear you more on that, in the spirit of the rules.

Mr. McDowell: Since the adoption of the Rules of Civil Procedure in 1938 we have had recognition of the liberal policy of making facts available. But there have been [vol. 1564] decisions since that time showing the limitations upon that discovery. They are not without limitation. And I think it is most significant that the Criminal Rules, under which we are operating with respect to the grand jury secrecy provision, was adopted in 1945, and that rule, adopted in 1945, seven years after the adoption of the rules of civil discovery, continued the policy of grand jury secrecy. And the adviser's note said it was intended to continue the traditional practice.

We submit that it was well known and that it was the practice of the Government to use grand juries to investigate violations of law and that under the decisions by the Supreme Court it is immaterial whether as a result of the investigation the Government brings a civil proceeding there under the statute the Government is required to do so. It does not affect, in any way, the propriety of the case—and it has never been considered by the courts which have considered this question prior to this decision here—and there have been four—that that required that the transcript of the grand jury investigation be turned over to the defendants for discovery purposes.

Thank you.

The Court: You are right, I didn't find any case where [vol. 1565] any judge ever ordered that.

Mr. Royall: Your Honor, I am not arguing any more about it. It is awfully tempting, though, with all these new things being injected every time Mr. McDowell gets up. We are going to abide by our decision and rest on the discussions that have been previously had and the briefs that were previously filed.

I want to make one inquiry only. Your Honor said something about the form of the order. We have tendered one, and we tendered it before any motion for rehearing had arisen.

The Court: Had been contemplated?

Mr. Royall: Well, we didn't know whether it was contemplated, but it hadn't come. In fact, we did not know it was going to be brought. And therefore we had a very short order, in accordance with your opinion.

Now, as I understand, your Honor would like us to tender another order in more elaborate form?

The Court: Well, no, you don't have to now. Let's see what kind of an order the Government is going to submit after I decide this matter. If you can't get together, then we will argue an order.

Mr. Royall: One other thing. As I understand it, you don't wish us to submit any more memoranda.

The Court: Please no.

[fols. 1566-1567] Mr. Royall: That's what I thought. But I wanted to be sure I understood that correctly.

The Court: I have never read as many memoranda in my life as I have read in this matter.

Mr. Royall: We would have to repeat, if we did.

The Court: Yes, and I don't want you to repeat. I hate monotony, General. It even goes in the law.

Mr. Royall: All right.

The Court: I shall consider everything you have said, Mr. McDowell. And in addition thereto I promise you I shall reread that Reynolds case and see whether I really miss your point or whether you miss mine. But either one of us is wrong. And that is not unusual.

And then I will let you know in a short time, probably by letter. I don't intend to write any more opinions, because I have got other undecided cases and summer is coming on.

I shall drop you a note and tell you what I am going to do with your re-argument question based on privilege and everything else.

APPLICATION FOR LEAVE TO FILE MOTION ON LESS THAN 15 DAYS NOTICE TO DEFENDANTS

Plaintiff applies to the Court for leave to file the attached Motion To Amend Or To Stay Order of July 24, 1956, together with accompanying papers, upon less than 15 days notice to the defendants. The reason for such application is that the motion seeks amendment or stay of an order whose effective date is August 24, 1956 and that 15 days notice cannot be given to the defendants. Copies of the motion have this date been served upon counsel of record for the defendants.

MOTION TO AMEND OR, ALTERNATIVELY, TO STAY ORDER OF JULY 24, 1956—Filed August 16, 1956

Plaintiff moves the Court to enter an amended order, in the form attached hereto, in substitution for the orders entered in the above-entitled action on July 24, 1956 by the Honorable Alfred E. Modarelli, directing the plaintiff within 30 days to make available to the defendants the transcripts of testimony of all witnesses who appeared before a certain grand jury. Alternatively, plaintiff moves the Court to stay the said orders of July 24, 1956, pending the filing of appeals therefrom to the Supreme Court of the United States and/or the filing of an application with that Court for an extraordinary writ, and the final determination by that Court of said appeal and/or application. The reasons for the motion are set forth in the attached affidavit of Herbert Brownell, Jr., the Attorney General of the United States.

(S.) Victor R. Hansen, Assistant Attorney General.

(S.) Joseph E. McDowell, Attorney, Department of Justice.

[fol. 1574] PROPOSED AMENDED ORDER

The Procter & Gamble Company, Colgate-Palmolive Company, Lever Brothers Company and the Associated Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc., having filed motions herein on September 24, 1954, November 28, November 28, and November 25, 1955, respectively, for an order granting leave to inspect and copy transcripts of the testimony of all witnesses before the Grand Jury of the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey, sitting in Newark, New Jersey, from May 1951 to November 1952, insofar as such testimony related to the investigation of antitrust law violations in the soap and synthetic detergent industry; and the Court having heard and considered arguments and briefs of counsel, and having rendered its opinion filed April 17, 1956, holding that the defendants are entitled to inspect and copy said transcripts of the aforesaid testimony of witnesses before the Grand Jury; and the plaintiff having filed a motion herein dated April 30, 1956 for reconsideration of this Court's ruling on defendants' motions to inspect the Grand Jury transcripts and for a ruling on plaintiff's claim of privilege; and the Court having heard and considered arguments and briefs of counsel on plaintiff's said motions and claim of privilege, and having rendered its opinion, filed July 9, 1956, [fol. 1575] Now, therefore, it is Ordered that the motion and claim of privilege of plaintiff be and they are hereby denied; and it is further Ordered that unless the plaintiff on or before August 24, 1956 produces at the office of the Department of Justice, Washington, D. C., or such other place as the parties may agree, and permits each of the defendants or their counsel to inspect and copy, by photostating or other means, all or any part of the aforesaid transcripts of the testimony of witnesses who appeared before the said Grand Jury, the Court will enter an order dismissing the complaint herein.

United States District Judge.

Dated: ———, 1956.

[fol. 1576] AFFIDAVIT OF HERBERT BROWNELL, JR.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

HERBERT BROWNELL, JR., being duly sworn, deposes and says:

I am the Attorney General of the United States and, as such, the chief law enforcement officer of the United States.

I am of the opinion that the order of the Court directing the plaintiff to make available to the defendants the grand jury transcripts is erroneous and that making such transcripts public would be contrary to the best interest of the administration of justice. It is my intention to seek review of that ruling in the Supreme Court of the United States.

The order of the Honorable Alfred E. Modarelli requires the Government to make the transcripts available to the defendants by August 24, 1956. In my considered judgment, it would be unseemly for the chief law enforcement officer of the United States to be placed in the dilemma either of having to comply with a court order which he considers erroneous and compliance with which he deems contrary to the public interest, or, alternatively, with being required to disobey the order, without first having an opportunity for effective appellate review of the order.

[fol. 1577] Under these circumstances, I believe that amendment of the orders as proposed in the within motion clearly would be in the public interest. However, if the Court concludes that such revision is not appropriate, I then urge that the orders be stayed until the United States has had an opportunity to file an appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court of the United States and/or to file with that Court an application for an extraordinary writ, and until that Court finally has determined said appeal and/or application.

BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFF'S MOTION TO AMEND OR TO STAY ORDER—Filed August 16, 1956

STATEMENT

From May 1951 until November 25, 1952 a Grand Jury sitting in this district investigated possible violations of the antitrust laws in the soap and synthetic detergent industry. No indictment was returned, but on December 11, 1952 the United States filed a civil complaint charging that since 1926 the defendants have been engaged in a conspiracy in unreasonable restraint of, and to monopolize, trade and commerce in the production and sale of soap and synthetic detergents, and that the three manufacturing defendants have monopolized that trade, in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act.

In the fall of 1955 each of the defendants filed a motion for an order granting leave to inspect and copy the transcript of testimony taken of all witnesses who appeared before the Grand Jury. That transcript is in the custody of the Attorney General. After argument, the District Court (per Judge Modarelli) held, in an opinion issued on April 17, 1956, that the defendants were entitled to inspect and copy the Grand Jury transcripts.

[fol. 1579] On May 3, 1956 the Government moved for reconsideration of that ruling. At the same time, it submitted a claim by the Attorney General that the Grand Jury transcripts ordered to be made available to the defendants were privileged against disclosure. On July 9, 1956 the Court issued an opinion denying the plaintiff's motion for reconsideration.

On July 24 the Court entered the order (dated July 23) which is the subject of the instant motion. That order directed the plaintiff to produce within 30 days at the offices of the Department of Justice, or at such other places as the parties may agree, and to permit each of the defendants or its counsel to inspect and copy; "all or any part of the transcripts of the testimony of all witnesses who appeared before the said Grand Jury. * * *."

ARGUMENT

Judge Modarelli's order requires the United States to make the Grand Jury transcripts available to the defendants by August 24, 1956. The Attorney General is of the view that that order is erroneous and further that making such transcripts public would be contrary to the public interest in the administration of justice (see his affidavit attached to motion). He has therefore decided to seek review of Judge Modarelli's ruling in the Supreme Court of the United States.

However, Supreme Court review obviously cannot be had by August 24, 1956, the date fixed for compliance in Judge Modarelli's order. We believe that it would be unseemly for the Attorney General, as the chief law enforcement officer of the United States, to be placed in the dilemma either by having to comply with a court order which he considers erroneous and compliance with which he deems contrary to the public interest, or, alternatively, with being required to disobey the order in order to obtain effective appellate review thereof. Under these circumstances, we urge the Court to enter an amended order which [fols. 1580-1581] provides that if the transcripts are not made available by August 24 (the date previously fixed by the Court), an order will be entered dismissing the complaint. Such an amendment of the order of July 24 would in no way prejudice the defendants, and it would avoid placing the Attorney General of the United States in the dilemma above noted. If such an amended order is entered, the United States intends to appeal from the subsequent judgment of dismissal, as was done in United States v. Cotton Valley Operators Committee, 339 U.S. 94 (judgment of dismissal affirmed by an equally divided court).¹

¹ Cf. United States v. Zucca, 354 U.S. 91, where the district court entered an order dismissing the Government's complaint in a denaturalization proceeding for failure to file an affidavit of good cause, on condition that if within 60 days the Government filed such affidavit, the complaint would be reinstated. The Government did not file the affidavit, and the court then entered a final order of dismissal. Record on appeal, United States v. Zucca, No. 213, October Term 1955, pp. 20, 22.

However, if the Court should conclude that the order should not be thus amended, we request the Court to stay the order pending the filing of an appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court of the United States and/or the filing with that Court of an application for an extraordinary writ, and final decision by the Supreme Court on such appeal and/or application. Such a stay would not prejudice the defendants, and would similarly avoid placing the Attorney General in the position of having to disobey an outstanding court order as a condition of testing its validity.

Respectfully submitted, (S.) Victor R. Hansen, Assistant Attorney General, (S.) Joseph E. McDowell, (S.) Daniel M. Friedman, Attorneys, Department of Justice.

ANSWER TO PLAINTIFF'S MOTION OF AUGUST 16, 1956—Filed
August 21, 1956

The defendant, The Procter & Gamble Company (hereinafter designated as "Procter"), answers plaintiff's motion of August 16, 1956, as follows:

As to the first request in plaintiff's instant motion, Procter says that the order herein dated July 23, 1956, is a proper and sufficient order at this stage of the proceedings. However, without waiving this position, Procter further states that the plaintiff's proposed relief of production or dismissal does not seem to be relief which Procter could in any way oppose.

This makes unnecessary a discussion of the alternative order proposed in plaintiff's motion, which alternative, if it had come before the Court for consideration, Procter would oppose.

I am an associate in the Washington office of the law firm of Dwight, Royall, Harris, Koegel & Caskey, 500 Wire Building, 1000 Vermont Avenue, N. W. Our firm represents The Procter & Gamble Company in the above-entitled proceedings.

On the afternoon of August 24, 1956, I presented myself at the offices of Daniel Friedman, Esq., one of the attorneys representing the United States in the above-entitled matter, whose offices are in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice, Washington 25, D. C.

At the aforementioned time and place, I personally talked to the aforesaid Daniel Friedman and stated that I was instructed and authorized by Kenneth C. Royall, Esq., a member of the above-named firm, to secure from the De-[fol. 1589-1590]partment of Justice, on behalf of our client, The Procter & Gamble Company, the transcripts of the Grand Jury testimony involved in the soap antitrust case in which The Procter & Gamble Company was a defendant, and I requested production of said transcripts.

Mr. Friedman asked to be excused, stating that he would like to confer with his colleagues in the Department of Justice before taking action on my request.

A short time later, the aforesaid Daniel Friedman returned to his office and stated that the plaintiff would not produce the transcripts.

It appearing that the plaintiff has failed to produce on or prior to August 24, 1956, for inspection and copying by the defendants the transcripts of testimony of witnesses before the Grand Jury of this Court referred to in the order of this Court entered herein on August 21, 1956; after due deliberation, upon all proceedings heretofore had herein, it is Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed that this action be and the same hereby is dismissed.

Dated: September 13th, 1956.

O'Mara, Schumann, Davis & Lynch, Attorneys for defendant Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Company; Cahill, Gordon, Reindel & Ohl, of Counsel; By Mathias F. Correa, and James Henry.

1607] Bailey, Schenck & Bennett, Attorneys for defendant Lever Brothers Company, By Alexander T. Schenck; Arnold, Fortas & Porter, of Counsel, By William McGovern.

McCarter, English & Studer, Attorneys for the Association, By Augustus C. Studer, Jr.; Davies, Richberg, Tydings, Beebe & Landa, of Counsel, By Adrien F. Busick.

Mr. Correa: If your Honor please, we have an order on the Colgate discovery motion which your Honor decided and then heard on reargument, and has subsequently been decided on reargument.

The order is in form agreed to by the Government and, orally, by ourselves. And we respectfully submit that.

(Document handed to the Court.)

The Court: Do you mind if I just take a look at this?

Mr. McGovern: Your Honor, I think that they are all substantially the same in form.

Mr. Fortas, of our firm, is out of the country and has been since the date of your Honor's decision. I have one, in similar form, consented to by the Government, on behalf of [1608] of Lever Brothers Company.

(Document handed to the Court.)

Mr. Royall: Your Honor, we have a form, also submitted to the Government, and approved as to form by the Government, and signed by counsel for all parties.

(Document handed to the Court.)

Mr. Busick: On behalf of the Association, your Honor, I present an order, the form of which has been approved by the Department.

(Document handed to the Court.)

The Court: Are there any more to be submitted?

Mr. Correa: I think that is the lot, if your Honor please.

The Court: Mr. McDowell, would you like to be heard?

Mr. McDowell: May it please the Court, at the same time that the Attorney General instructed me to sign the consent of the Government to the form of this order he also instructed me to ask that the orders be presented in open court so that I might state the position of the Government with respect to his order and the subject.

The Court: You may do so.

Mr. McDowell: I am instructed, your Honor, by the [fol. 1609] Attorney General to inform the Court that the Government must respectfully decline to produce the transcripts called for by the orders which have been tendered.

The Court: You heard what Mr. McDowell said?

Mr. Correa: Yes, if your Honor please, I heard what Mr. McDowell has said. Now, the order in the form submitted to your Honor provides that the Government shall make production within thirty days from the entry of the order. I take it that that means, as a practical matter, that we shall have to wait till the expiration of that time to find out whether the Government adheres to the position which has been enunciated here this morning or not. If they do adhere to that position then, I take it, we shall have to take such further steps under the rules as we may be advised.

Mr. Royall: That is our position, also, your Honor.

Mr. McGovern: And Lever Brothers adheres to that position, also, your Honor, plus the fact, as I stated, that Mr. Fortas is out of the country and we have had no opportunity to consult about the position the Government has taken.

Mr. Busick: I take the same position, your Honor. [fol. 1610] The Court: Now, the provisions of all the orders are substantially the same.

Mr. Correa: They are identical in form.

Mr. Royall: Yes.

The Court: Identical in form. All provide for thirty days.

Mr. Royall: Yes, sir.

Mr. Correa: Yes, your Honor.

The Court: I am not surprised that the Attorney General feels that way about it. I don't suppose your adversaries are, either.

Mr. McDowell: May I say, Your Honor, with respect to the thirty-day matter, we agreed to the inclusion of the provision for thirty days at the request of the defendants, but that it makes no difference to the position of the Government. I was instructed to state that the Government will respectfully decline to produce them.

The Court: Obviously, I welcome any test you wish to make of this decision, Mr. McDowell, you and the Attorney General.

You wish to file them today, gentlemen?

Mr. Corréa: If your Honor please, sir.

The Court: Nothing further to be done now?

[fol. 1611] Mr. Royall: No, sir.

The Court: We will wait for thirty days, is that right?

Mr. Corréa: Yes, if your Honor please.

The Court: At which time you shall take such action as you deem necessary under the circumstances.

Mr. Corréa: That is correct, your Honor.

The Court: No. 10, United States of America vs. Procter & Gamble, and others, hearing on plaintiff's motion to amend or stay the order of July 24, 1956, heretofore entered by this Court. Are we ready on that?

Mr. McDowell: The plaintiff is ready, your Honor.

Mr. Correa: The defendants are ready, your Honor.

Mr. Royall: Ready.

Mr. Rossi: I respectfully move the admission of Mr. Daniel Friedman, attorney for Department of Justice, Antitrust Division. He is admitted to practice in New York State and before the United States Supreme Court.

The Court: I am very pleased to admit Mr. Friedman [fol. 1614] for the purpose of this motion.

Mr. Friedman: Thank you, your Honor.

The Court: Go ahead, Mr. McDowell.

Mr. McDowell: Your Honor, our motion this morning seeks to put in proper posture for review on appeal your Honor's ruling with respect to the production of grand jury transcript for civil discovery purposes.

Because this matter does involve essentially this question of putting the matter in proper posture for appeal, I would like, with your Honor's indulgence, to ask Mr. Friedman, who is from the appellate section of the Department, to present the matter to the Court. I will, of course, be prepared to answer any questions your Honor may wish to address to me.

The Court: All right, Mr. Friedman, we will hear you from the appellate section.

Mr. Friedman: May it please your Honor, the order which your Honor entered in this matter on the 24th of July directed the United States to make available to the defendants within thirty days the grand jury transcripts. This order by its terms places the Attorney General in a very difficult dilemma, because he has a number of alternatives and we think that each of these alternatives would involve a serious violation of an important public interest [fol. 1615] which the Attorney General thinks he should carry out. And we are therefore coming before your Honor to suggest that the order be amended in a way to eliminate these possibilities. And, alternatively, if your Honor does not see fit to amend the order we are asking for a stay of the order pending the taking of necessary appellate review in the Supreme Court.

The amendment which we are proposing to your Honor is that instead of the order directing us within thirty days to make the grand jury transcripts available that the order recite that in the event the United States does not make the grand jury transcripts available within thirty days the Court will then enter an order of dismissal.

The Attorney General has a great deal of respect for the orders of this Court and he feels that it is not in the public interest that in order to test the validity of your Honor's ruling with reference to the production of the grand jury transcripts he should be put in the position that he has to disobey an outstanding order of the Court in order to seek review of that order.

If, on the one hand, he is to comply with your Honor's order and make the transcripts available, from the appellate point of view that would moot the matter, because once [fol. 1616] the secrecy of the grand jury transcript has been breached the whole issue becomes moot. Moreover, it would require him to turn over the grand jury transcripts and thus dissipate and destroy the secrecy which he believes the public interest requires to be maintained.

On the other hand, if he does nothing and just remains until after the 30th day and does not comply, he is then put in the position that he stands before the bar of public opinion that he has disobeyed a valid and outstanding order of this Court which is within the Court's power to exercise.

We have already indicated that the Attorney General respectfully disagrees with your Honor's order and we think that he thinks that it is his obligation to test this order before the Supreme Court. But he does not think—and he very strongly is of this view—that the Executive Department of the Government in order to test the order of the Court should have to disobey it. We think that is an unseemly position. And we want to make it very clear that in requesting this amendment of the order we are not in any way waiving any rights to challenge the substance of the ruling on appeal. We are merely trying to change the form of the order, to put it in terms that we can get effective appellate review of the order without being in [fol. 1617] the position of having to disobey the order as a condition to testing it.

We think there is no question but that this Court has the power to enter such an order. I don't seriously think it can be suggested that the Court could not amend the order in those terms.

Very briefly, in the event that your Honor declines to amend the order, we then suggest that the status quo should be preserved pending an appeal from the order, or, alternatively—we haven't, frankly, decided which we are going to do, or both; it is a very difficult question—the filing of an application for an extraordinary writ. And we therefore ask if your Honor does not amend the order that he should stay the order until such time as we have had the application filed and the Supreme Court has disposed of it.

Now, I don't know, frankly, what objections, if any, our adversaries are going to make. And I respectfully suggest that we might hear from them and then we will be prepared to answer their objections.

The Court: Thank you, Mr. Friedman.

Mr. Friedman: Thank you, your Honor.

The Court: General Royall.

Mr. Royall: Your Honor, the defendant Procter & Gamble Company, The Procter & Gamble Company, which we designate here as Procter, answers the argument made here today as follows:

As to the first request, primary request, in the plaintiff's motion, Procter says that the order herein dated July 23, 1956, is a proper and sufficient order at this stage of the proceedings.

However, without waiving this position Procter further states that the plaintiff's proposed relief of production or dismissal does not seem to be a relief which Procter could in any manner oppose.

This makes unnecessary a discussion of the alternate order proposed in the motion, which alternative, if it comes before the Court for consideration, Procter would oppose.

The Court: You understand, Mr. Friedman?

Mr. Friedman: Yes, I understand they are not objecting to the amended order.

Mr. Royall: We are not objecting to the relief, yes, your Honor.

The Court: Mr. Fortas.

Mr. Fortas: If your Honor please, our position is approximately the same, that is to say, we think the Government should have produced the documents. We don't believe that the Government is entitled to any special position in litigation. We understand that to be the rule of law in [fol. 1619] this country. And the Government has come in here and moved for a dismissal of the case in the event that the documents are not produced and we don't see how we can object to that on behalf of the Leyer Brothers Company.

Mr. Correa: That, if your Honor please, states substantially the position of the Colgate-Palmolive Company, which likewise wishes to insist upon production of the papers required by your Honor's order, in the manner specified in your Honor's order. But equally, as stated by Mr. Fortas, we do not see how we can oppose the Government's motion, as we understand it.

Mr. Welch: Your Honor, on behalf of the Association, I would like to adopt the views expressed by counsel for the respondents.

The Court: Well, it looks like we are all in agreement. I certainly have no objection. You will submit an order in conformity with the opinions expressed by all counsel and I will sign it.

Mr. McDowell: Thank you, your Honor. I believe there is a draft of the order before the Court with our motion papers.

The Court: Have you gentlemen read the proposed order which Mr. McDowell has prepared?

Mr. Royall: Yes, sir; Procter did and I assume the [fol. 1620] others did.

Mr. Correa: We have.

Mr. Royall: My statement was made on the basis of the order attached to the plaintiff's motion.

The Court: All right, gentlemen, the order will be signed since there is no objection to it.

Mr. Correa: May we have a moment, if your Honor please?

The Court: Yes, sir.

(Counsel confer.)

Mr. Correa: There is nothing of substance, if your Honor please, except that—Is it proposed that the order in exactly this form be signed? I think technically it is an amended order, isn't it?

The Court: Yes, I imagine it is an amended order. You mean the title of it?

Mr. Correa: Yes, sir.

The Court: You have no objection to putting "Amended Order" there, have you?

Mr. Friedman: Certainly not, your Honor.

The Court: All right. My secretary isn't here so you will have to have someone in the United States Attorney's office type it, or Mr. McDowell write it in, or someone else.

Mr. Royall: Your Honor, I read a statement and we [fol. 1621] have it in the form of an answer which states our entire position. I would like to file it so it will be a matter of record and give a copy to the Government.

The Court: Does anybody else wish to file any?

Mr. Fortas: No, your Honor. On behalf of Lever, I would like to subscribe to the written statement filed by Procter.

Mr. Correa: And on behalf of Colgate I should like this record to stand as a record of our position on the Government's motion to amend its order.

Mr. Welch: That is also so for the Association.

The Court: That makes it unanimous.

Nothing further now and we will recess then to await the pleasure of the Naturalization Bureau when they are ready for the candidates for citizenship.

BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF MOTION BY DEFENDANT, THE PROCTER
& GAMBLE COMPANY, FOR ORDER DIRECTING DISCLOSURE OF
GRAND JURY TRANSCRIPTS—September 24, 1954

I. Names of Parties and Nature of Proceedings

This motion is for an order granting leave to The Procter & Gamble Company (hereinafter called "Procter") and its counsel to inspect and copy, commencing within ten (10) days after the entry of the order herein, the following documents or papers which are either in the possession or control of plaintiff and its counsel or are otherwise within the control of this Court.

The transcripts of the testimony of all witnesses taken before the Grand Jury of the United States District Court [fol. 1623] for the District of New Jersey sitting in Newark from May 1951 to November 1952 in connection with an investigation of possible antitrust law violations in the soap and synthetic detergent industry. (See proceeding numbered Cr. 174-51, 175-51, 176-51, 177-51.)

II. Statement of Facts

The facts are fully recited in the motion and affidavit of Kenneth C. Royall, dated September 24, 1954.

III. Question Involved

Whether Procter is entitled to inspect and copy the said transcripts of Grand Jury testimony.

IV. Argument

A. Procter is Entitled to Inspect and Copy the Grand Jury Transcripts in Accordance with the Discovery Procedures Prevailing in the Federal Courts.

Under the discovery provisions of the Federal Rules, Procter, on showing good cause, is entitled to inspect and copy designated documents and papers, not privileged, which are relevant to the subject matter of the pending action or might lead to the discovery of admissible evidence.

The Grand Jury transcripts here sought to be examined are obviously relevant to the subject matter of this action or might lead to the discovery of admissible evidence. They reflect testimony taken in connection with an investigation of possible antitrust law violations in the soap industry. [fol. 1624] The documents subpoenaed in the same Grand Jury proceeding were ordered produced for the plaintiff's inspection under Rule 34 in this action. Thus, plaintiff itself has acknowledged the relevancy of information obtained in the Grand Jury investigation.

Furthermore, counsel for plaintiff, in his affidavit of March 21, 1953, filed in this cause in support of plaintiff's motion under Rule 34, dated March 6, 1953, admitted that he had been authorized to carry on and did carry on an investigation of the soap industry so that, inter alia, a determination could be made as to what action should be taken to enforce the antitrust laws "through criminal or civil proceedings or both." Therefore, at least one of the purposes of the Grand Jury investigation was investigation with a view to the possibility of this civil litigation. Indeed, at the hearings before this Court on March 25, 1953, the Court, in order to ascertain whether plaintiff used the Grand Jury proceeding solely to obtain information to proceed civilly, sought to elicit from plaintiff's counsel a statement as to whether he tried to get an indictment. Plaintiff's counsel failed to give this information despite the request made of him (Tr. p. 28-30). The relevancy of the information before the Grand Jury, therefore, seems plain.

[fol. 1625] Unless this motion is granted, Procter cannot obtain information bearing on the issues of this case. Good cause for granting the motion is evident. Such information is necessary to an adequate preparation and presentation of Procter's case and cannot be obtained in any manner other than by the granting of this motion. Plaintiff has for several years had the benefit of the transcript itself. It has also had the benefit of the use of the transcript in connection with and as a background to the documents which Procter and others were required to produce.

B. No Need for Secrecy Exists

Whatever may be said concerning the so-called secrecy of Grand Jury proceedings, one thing is clear. Under Rule 6 (a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure this Court has the power, "preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding" to direct an attorney or stenographer, as well as others, to "disclose matters occurring before the grand jury."

This and other Courts have recognized that the secrecy of Grand Jury proceedings will not be enforced once the reasons for secrecy have disappeared. United States v. White, D. N. J., 104 F. Supp. 120; United States v. Byoir, N. D. Tex., 58 F. Supp. 273, 275, aff'd 5 Cir., 147 F. 2d 336; [fol. 1626] In re Grand Jury Proceedings, E. D. Pa., 4 F. Supp. 283, 285; Atwell v. United States, 4 Cir., 162 Fed. 97, 101; United States v. Alper, 2 Cir., 156 F. 2d 222, 226.

Among the reasons most frequently stated for lifting the veil of secrecy is the fact that the Grand Jury has been discharged. In the instant case, the Grand Jury has been discharged for almost two years. Moreover, no indictments were returned against the defendants and no criminal action under the antitrust laws is pending against them.

As Judge Kirkpatrick said in In re Grand Jury Proceedings, supra, discharge is not the only circumstance which may move the court to disregard secrecy. Disclosure may be granted when it appears that "the ends of justice will be furthered" (p. 285).

Here, no need for protecting Grand Jurors from harrassment appears. The identity of most if not all of those who testified before the Grand Jury has been known for many months and it is believed that witnesses would have no objection to disclosure of their testimony. Moreover, Procter is not seeking to pry into the deliberations or votes of the Grand Jurors.

[fol. 1627] That the ends of justice will be furthered by granting disclosure is conclusively demonstrated, we submit, by the unconscionable advantages now possessed by plaintiff in its preparation (these will be further discussed in the next point), by Procter's need to be fully informed of the nature of the charges and evidence to be adduced, to be able intelligently to prepare for trial, by its need to discover defensive material which does not appear from the documents which plaintiff may be required to supply, and by the need to have a transcript available for use at the trial in connection with testimony adduced by either party.

C. Parties are Entitled to Substantial Equality in Opportunity to Prepare for Trial.

Commencing with the issuance of the Grand Jury subpoenas in May 1951, plaintiff has proceeded uninterrupted in a one-sided discovery process. In the Grand Jury proceeding, plaintiff examined witnesses under oath without notice to Procter, without opportunity by Procter to procure protective orders, without opportunity to explain or clarify by cross-examination. It obtained documents from numerous companies without opportunity for Procter to obtain any limiting relief, except in the case of its own documents. Meanwhile, Procter could institute no discovery proceedings of its own. As appears on page 3, supra, it is clear that the Grand Jury proceedings were actually wholly or in part an investigation of and preparation for this civil case.

We are now in a civil case and have been for over a year and a half. Plaintiff's advantages acquired in the criminal proceeding have, over Procter's continuing protests, been confirmed by orders in the civil case permitting plaintiff to retain and make use of documents secured in the criminal proceeding.

Procter, by this motion, seeks a partial alleviation of the disadvantages confronting it. Though plaintiff's three and a half year handicap cannot be erased, Procter seeks to prevent to some extent the continuing inequalities. On principles of fair play, it seeks permission to see the same testimony which, presumably, plaintiff has employed in its preparation over the years.

Fair play is at the root of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure which were designed to eliminate "surprise" and "technical advantage", to accomplish equality of preparation by affording the "widest possible opportunity for knowledge" by all parties of the facts, to stamp the federal judicial process with a "character of frankness and fairness", and to promote the administration of justice by permitting decision on the merits rather than upon technicalities. 1 Barron and Holtzoff, Federal Practice and Procedure (1950), Foreword, p. V; Pike and Willis, The New Federal Deposition-Discovery Procedure, 38 Col. L. Rev. 1179, 1180, 1187, 1459 (1938); 1 Moore's Federal Practice (1938) 45; Victory v. Manning, 3 Cir. 128 F. 2d 415, 417; Walsh v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., E. D. N. Y., 26 F. Supp. 566, 573; Mackerer v. New York Cent. R. Co., E. D. N. Y., 1 F. R. D. 408, 411.

Similarly, the due process clause of Amendment V to the Constitution incorporates as fundamental law the principles of fair play, including fair play in the conduct of judicial proceedings. These principles include a "reasonable opportunity to know the claims of the opposing party and to meet them." Morgan v. United States, 304 U. S. 1, 18, 19; Endicott Co. v. Encyclopedia Press, 266 U. S. 285, 288; Baker v. Hudspeth, 10 Cir., 129 F. 2d 779, 781. The Government as a litigant is subject to the Federal Rules (1 Moore's Federal Practice [1938] 49) and "should be held to the same standards of fair dealing as we prescribe for other legal contests." Anti-Fascist Committee v. McGrath, 341 U. S. 123, 177.

As matters now stand, plaintiff can cull from a mass of information what it deems necessary for its case, while Procter cannot even inspect the material. Unless this motion is granted, Procter is deprived of a chance to ascertain from the testimony, already seen and culled by plaintiff, any rebuttal or defensive matter or any suggestion for further preparation, discovery or investigation.

Plaintiff's advantages are substantial. Its ability to use information in the preparation of its case which is denied to Procter could seriously affect the outcome of the litigation. The trial, instead of being on the merits, could turn on surprise or on presentation of less than all the facts. At the very least, the trial could proceed without Procter having important information which plaintiff has obtained and utilized through the processes of this very Court. The Federal Rules and the due process clause, when applied to his case, require, we submit, the granting of the relief here prayed.

Conclusion

For the above reasons, this motion should be granted.

[fol. 1632] IN UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY

BRIEF OF THE UNITED STATES IN OPPOSITION TO MOTION BY DEFENDANT, THE PROCTER & GAMBLE COMPANY FOR ORDER DIRECTING DISCLOSURE OF GRAND JURY TRANSCRIPTS—Filed
November 3, 1954.

Parties to and Nature of This Proceeding

One of the defendants in the above-styled action, The Procter & Gamble Company (hereinafter called "Procter"), has moved this Court for an order granting leave to it and its counsel to inspect and copy the transcripts of the testimony of all witnesses taken before a Grand Jury of the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey.

Procter's motion is made "pursuant to the discovery provisions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and in accordance with the powers of this Court to act in the interest of justice with respect to litigation pending before it." Procter's Motion, dated September 24, 1954, p. 1.

Statement of Facts

Prior to the filing of this civil action by the United States charging Procter and others with violations of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U. S. C. §§ 1 and 2), a Federal Grand Jury sitting in Newark from May 1951 to November 1952 investigated possible violations of the antitrust laws in the soap and synthetic detergents industry.

[fol. 1633] This Grand Jury was discharged on November 25, 1952, without returning any indictments. On December 11, 1952, the United States filed this civil action. Several weeks later, on March 6, 1953, plaintiff moved for an order under Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure requiring Procter to produce for inspection and copying a number of documents which it had previously submitted to the Grand Jury pursuant to subpoena. Procter vigorously opposed this motion, "above all else" on the ground that "the Government utilized criminal process for the purpose of investigation and discovery in a civil action and in order to evade the protective requirements of the rules and statutes governing discovery." Brief in Opposition to Plaintiff's Motion for Production by Defendant, The Procter & Gamble Company, of Documents Pursuant to Rule 34 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, dated March 17, 1953, p. 13; see also pp. 4-10, thereof, and the Affidavit of Kenneth C. Royall, attached thereto as Exhibit "A", pp. 22-24. Nevertheless, this Court granted plaintiff's motion by order dated May 27, 1953.

Immediately thereafter, on June 4, 1953, Procter moved this Court for an order forbidding plaintiff from using against Procter in this case, for any purpose prior to or during trial, any documents (including all copies, notes, evidence, etc. obtained from or made of them) submitted to the Grand Jury by Procter, by any of the defendants other than Procter or by any other person or firm. In support of this motion Procter again argued that the Government had used the Grand Jury proceedings and the criminal subpoenas to prepare for this civil action, thus depriving Procter of the protections granted by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure with respect to discovery proceedings. Brief in Support of Motion By Defendant, The Procter & Gamble Company, To Suppress Certain Documents, dated June 4, 1953, p. 1; Affidavit of Kenneth C.

Royall, in support thereof, dated June 4, 1953, p. 2, par. (c). Procter's motion was denied by the Court in an order entered January 14, 1954.

[fol. 1634]

Question Involved

Should Procter be permitted to inspect and copy the transcripts of testimony taken before the Grand Jury?

Argument

I. Grand Jury Transcripts Are Protected By The Solemn Rule Of Secrecy Surrounding The Grand Jury Process

Transcripts of testimony taken before Federal Grand Juries traditionally have been shielded from scrutiny. This policy of protecting the testimony given before a Grand Jury rests ultimately on the protection of the Grand Jury process itself. Goodman v. United States, 108 F. 2d 516, 519 (9th Cir., 1939); Cf. United States v. Smythe et al., 104 F. Supp. 283 (N. D. Cal., 1952).

Accordingly, motions to examine grand Jury transcripts, absent a showing of extreme compulsion (i.e., fraud or other serious irregularity), have been uniformly denied. See, for example:

United States v. Violon, 173 Fed. 501 (S. D. N. Y. 1909)

United States v. Rubin et al., 214 Fed. 507 (D. Conn. 1914)

United States v. Gouled et al., 253 Fed. 242 (S. D. N. Y. 1918)

United States v. Silverthorne et al., 265 Fed. 853 (W. D. N. Y. 1920)

United States v. Garsson et al., 291 Fed. 646 (S. D. N. Y. 1923)

United States v. Morse et al., 292 Fed. 273 (S. D. N. Y. 1922)

II. No Good Cause Exists Why This Court Should Permit Disclosure of the Grand Jury Transcripts

Notwithstanding the persistent and uniform application over the years of the rule of secrecy, counsel for Procter argue that in the circumstances of this case, the ends of justice will be furthered by the disclosure of the Grand Jury transcripts. They contend that examination of the transcripts will materially aid them in their preparation for trial; and that since plaintiff has had the advantage of having them available for use it is necessary in fairness and to comply with the spirit of the Federal Rules for these minutes now to be turned over to them. Procter's Brief, p. 6-9.

In support of these contentions, counsel for Procter assert that plaintiff used the Grand Jury process to investigate and prepare this civil action. Procter's Motion, dated September 24, 1954, p. 2, par. (c); Procter's Brief, pp. 3, 7. This is the same assertion previously urged by counsel for Procter first, in an effort to block plaintiff's motion under rule 34 for the production of certain documents submitted to the Grand Jury, and second, in an effort to suppress the same in this case of these and other documents and evidence. Statement of Facts, pp. 2-3).

It is sufficient to note, with respect to this point, that this assertion has been rejected twice before in this case.

Opinion dated May 11, 1953, 14 F. R. D. 230, 233; Opinion dated January 14, 1954 (unreported).

[fol. 1636] As for the contention that "fairness" requires the disclosure to defendants of Grand Jury transcripts, the same argument has been vigorously advanced in other proceedings but never accepted by the Courts. During the pre-trial stages of United States v. Henry S. Morgan et al., Civil Action No. 43-757, S. D. N. Y., filed Oct. 30, 1947, counsel for the movant declared, at a hearing on an identical motion, that the veil of secrecy surrounding Grand Jury proceedings "should be lifted in a discovery proceeding in a case of this immense scope where the plaintiff has the advantage of accumulating the material for many years." Transcripts of Hearing Before Judge Medina, December 8, 1948, United States v. Henry S. Morgan et al., supra, p. 193, attached as Exhibit "A" to this Brief. As the colloquy on this point indicates, Judge Medina denied this motion from the bench.

The very motion and arguments here made by Procter were also considered by Chief Judge Leahy of the District of Delaware in United States v. General Motors Corp., supra, p. 4. Prior to the institution of that case two Federal Grand Juries, one in 1951 and another in 1952 had investigated alleged violations of the Elkins Act. The first indicted a railroad, and the second returned a "no true bill" in favor of General Motors. Thereafter, the United States instituted a civil action against General Motors for alleged violation of the Act. In preparation for trial, General Motors moved for an order directing production of the transcripts of both Grand Juries for inspection and copying. The motion was denied. In his opinion Judge Leahy pointed out that discovery under the Federal Rules is not without limits; that "it must be halted when it attempts to invade ground reserved for loftier reasons than thoroughness of preparing one's case on the civil side of the court" (pp. 486-487). Because of the pertinency of that case to the issue now before this Court, the following extensive quote is appropriate:

[fol. 1637] Protection of the grand jury process itself has been the basis for suspending the usual exercise of discovery rights of a litigant. Revelation of the jury minutes may, or may not, have an adverse effect on the particular jurors and witnesses participating in the proceedings whose record is sought, but this alone is not the prime concern. The effect on subsequent proceedings, on jurors, on witnesses, on the privacy of the system itself, is of greater moment. The secrecy is maintained regardless as to what may arise in subsequent collateral litigation, even though long past the event of the Grand Jury's meetings. The very secrecy of the hearings is fundamental to our procedure, whether viewed in an historical perspective or under our current lights. Even in a criminal case, only extraordinary circumstances ever prompt a court to exercise a discretionary power to disclose.

I do not find in the present action for civil penalties any justification for ordering production for inspection and copying the transcripts of the Grand Jury's meetings. It is argued the Department of Justice will have the transcripts of the Grand Jury available and may use them, and such, it is suggested, will be a tactical advantage the discovery rules were designed to eliminate. But defendant here, has other discovery techniques at its disposal through which most of the information sought and clues to other possible sources may be obtained. The announced intent to use the transcript as an impeachment tool appears to me improper and demonstrates how disclosure could seriously impair the grand jury system, the freedom and effectiveness of its inquiry and deliberation. If a precedent is set that evidence before a grand jury may at some future time be disclosed to the probing examination of civil litigants in preparation of the trial of their cause not alone in a collateral matter but, as in the case at bar, in directly related matters where the inquisitorial examination of the grand jury and a civil litigant's discovery in preparation for trial encompass the same subject matter and include an identity of events, such precedent would tend to restrict the free function of the grand jury.

My beliefs coincide with those expressed by Judge Learned Hand in U. S. v. Garsson, D. C. 291 F. 646, 649: "It [i. e., the disclosure of the transcript] is said to lie in discretion, and perhaps it does, but no judge of this court has granted it, and I hope none ever will." 15 F. R. D. 486, 487-488.

III. The Authorities Cited by Procter

Procter argues, nevertheless, that since the Grand Jury has been discharged, no indictments having been returned, [fol. 1638] there is now no reason to preserve the secrecy of the testimony given before that body. The five cases cited in support of this contention (Procter's Brief, pp. 4-5) are not, it is submitted, authority for the order Procter seeks.

United States v. White, 104 F. Supp. 120 (D. N. J. 1952) decided by this Court, is clearly an exception to the general rule, an exception which is not applicable here. There, the defendant had been indicted for perjury before a Grand Jury. This Court ordered that the defendant be permitted to inspect and copy her testimony before the Grand Jury on the ground that "an exception to the general rule arises in perjury actions which are based on the defendant's testimony before a Grand Jury." 104 F. Supp. at p. 122. In so holding, however, this Court cited and quoted with approval (p. 121) the "still accepted view" summed up in United States v. National Wholesale Druggists' Ass'n., 61 F. Supp. 590 (D. N. J. 1945), as follows:

While it is apparent that the Court has the power to grant a motion for inspection of the Grand Jury minutes, that power will be exercised only in cases of extreme compulsion. Where there is no allegation of an improperly constituted body, nor of fraud, misconduct or corruption and no positive allegation that there was no evidence of any sort before the Grand Jury, such power will not be exercised. 61 F. Supp. at page 593.

In United States v. Byoir, 58 F. Supp. 273 (N. D. Tex. 1945), aff'd, 147 F. 2d 336 (5th Cir. 1945), the District Court permitted disclosure of such of the proceedings before a Grand Jury as related to Byoir's alleged participation in a criminal conspiracy, in order that he might show no probable cause at removal proceedings in New York. This ruling was based primarily on the ground that Government counsel had already "breached the rule with reference to the secrecy of the Grand Jury proceedings. (58 F. Supp. at p. 274) Moreover, the Court of Appeals modified this order so as to permit disclosure only if the removal court should seek the information contained in the Grand Jury minutes, and, it should be noted, the subpoena duces tecum was subsequently quashed by the removal court. Order of Judge Leibell, S. D. N. Y., February 17, 1945. [fol. 1639] In In Re Grand Jury Proceedings, 4 F. Supp. 283 (E. D. Pa. 1933); disclosure of the testimony of two witnesses before a Pennsylvania Federal Grand Jury was permitted to be made by a United States Attorney, acting in his official capacity and in the public interest, to a New Jersey tribunal. This case is similar to the recent decision in In Re Bullock, 103 F. Supp. 639 (D. D. C. 1952), not cited by Procter, where the public interest in disclosure, as opposed to the wishes of a private litigant, was determined to be paramount to the policy of secrecy. In the Bullock case, the District of Columbia Commissioners were permitted to examine the testimony of a D. C. police inspector before a Grand Jury which had investigated his dealings with a notorious gambler, on the ground that they had the duty and responsibility of supervising the police department. The Court refused, however, to permit them to examine the whole Jury transcript.

In Atwell v. United States, 162 Fed. 97 (4th Cir. 1908) no motion for disclosure of Grand Jury testimony was involved. There, the Court reversed the conviction of a Grand Juror who had revealed to defendant's counsel the substance of certain testimony before the Grand Jury. The Court said that the Juror's oath did not require perpetual secrecy in view of the fact that defendant's counsel could have obtained the names of witnesses and inquired into their testimony directly. Moreover, with respect to this holding, the Court in United States v. American Medical Ass'n., 26 F. Supp. 429 (D. D. C. 1939), where a motion for examination of Grand Jury transcripts was at issue, said (p. 430):

The departure taken by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, some thirty years ago (Atwell v. United States, 162 F. 97, 17 L. R. A., N. S., 1049, 15 Ann. Cas. 253), in holding that secrecy is not required after indictment has been found, the accused arrested and the Grand Jury discharged, seems to have made but slight impression upon the federal courts in disposing of many kindred questions arising since that time. I cannot accept the conclusions or reasons stated in the Atwell case. Considerations of public policy demand a lasting secrecy. Jurors are thereby inspired with assurance of security in discharging their important duties and restrained from impeaching their findings. United States v. Rintelen, D. C., 235 F. 387. Witnesses are encouraged to truth and frankness. Metzler v. United States, 9 Cir. 64 F. 2d 203.

Lastly, Procter cites United States v. Alper, 156 F. 2d 222 (2d Cir. 1946). There a motion was made to have the transcript of the testimony of two witnesses before a Grand Jury examined by the trial judge to determine if there were inconsistencies between that testimony and their testimony at the trial. The trial judge's refusal to inspect the transcript was noted as one of many grounds of appeal. The Court of Appeals reversed the conviction on other grounds, and added some dicta relating to the circumstances under which a trial judge should examine the grand jury transcript.

Conclusion

The policy of insulating Grand Jury proceedings from disclosure is deeply rooted in the law, and has as its purpose the protection of the Grand Jury process itself. No case is cited by Procter, nor has any been discovered, where this rule of secrecy was lifted for the purpose and the reasons given by Procter. Moreover, in two recent cases directly in point, the very arguments now advanced by Procter were specifically rejected and the same motions were denied. For all of these reasons therefore, Procter's motion should be denied.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Southern District of New York, ss:

I, William V. Connell, Clerk of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, do hereby certify that the writings annexed to this certificate, to wit: Cover page of Stenographer's Minutes of Hearing before Judge Medina on Dec. 8, 1948 and also pages 190 and 193 inclusive and page 212 of said minutes in Case of U. S. A. vs. Henry S. Morgan, et al., Civil 43-757, have been compared with their originals on file and remaining of record in this office; that they are correct transcripts therefrom of the said originals.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed the seal of the said Court at the City of New York, in the Southern District of New York, this 7th day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and fifty-four and of the Independence of the United States the One Hundred and Seventy-ninth.

[Stamp:] Filed December 31, 1948. U. S. District Court.

[fol. 1643] claim of Government immunity qua Government—and those words I quote from their brief: “Government immunity qua Government”—to the language of Judge Moscowitz in the Welling case, where he says at page 4 of our brief or reply memorandum—

The Court: I have that.

Mr. Carson: Off the record I might read the words.

Mr. Carson: On the record again: We think the broader and more complete rule has been stated by Judge Rifkind again in this District in the Bank Line case on page 7 of this same memorandum. We have some discussion of it on page 7. On page 8 Judge Rifkind says, in substance, that when the Government has this extraordinary position of privilege it must select whether it will retain its immunity in the Civil courts, but when it comes to making the election, when that will is exercised in favor of litigating its claims, it is thereby exercised in favor of surrendering the conditional privilege of suppressing its housekeeping secrets when these are useful in the ascertainment of liability.

We think that is the rule which your Honor should apply here.

The Court: How about proceedings before the Grand Jury? Isn't there a certain secrecy there?

Mr. Carson: I want to revert to the Grand Jury minutes and I want to divide that into two categories.

I would say documents which are otherwise relevant and would be produced under your Honor's order are not given any immunity by being shown to the Grand Jury first; passing through its hands they do not pass through an immunizing bath so as to protect them from our inspection otherwise available under Rule 34.

We would like to go further, and as a separate category of documents—

The Court: I agree with that statement; they do not gain immunity by being shown to the Grand Jury.

Mr. Carson: We have written a relevant letter, and they have it, and we have a copy, but they cannot by producing it before the Grand Jury cover it with privilege.

To go on with the Grand Jury, we would like separately to ask your Honor if you grant this relief to provide that we may have inspection of the Grand Jury minutes as a separate head of decision on my statement, which I think will be conceded to be the fact, that that Grand Jury is discharged. I think that makes a great difference.

These documents were called for before a grand jury, and were produced, as I understand, before a jury sitting in this District which, according to a letter—

The Court: Mr. Carson, I think you are wasting time on this part about getting me to direct that the Government give the defendants copies of the Grand Jury minutes. I have been thinking about that a good deal since I read these briefs, and I just am not going to be the first Judge in this District to do that. I think it is a very unwise thing to do.

Mr. Carson: Now your Honor is giving me the benefit of the fact, which I think I am entitled to, that the Grand Jury is discharged?

The Court: I know.

Mr. Carson: There is a letter from the United States Attorney on file with the Clerk's Office saying it was discharged April 15, 1948. If it were still sitting, under such circumstances, where there is no question before a witness, [fol. 1645] we would probably not apply, but now it is closed and we have a civil litigation and it would seem to us the most relevant source, perhaps not the only source but the readiest source for information as to the matters referred to in the complaint, both favorable to the defendants as well as unfavorable, would be the statements of witnesses before that jury.

I don't want to labor the point if your Honor says you have already passed—

The Court: No. I think my mind is set on it. It may be I have been unduly affected by that statement of Judge Learned Hand. It may be my experience over the years in these matters has so solidified my judgment that I am not open to argument on it, and I may be wrong, but I do believe that I am past the point where the argument would persuade me.

Mr. Carson: I am not going to take your Honor's time beyond that except to call to your attention the statement of principle by Professor Wigmore which was called to your Honor's attention too, I think, and to Judge Hand's modification of his earlier statement when sitting in the Circuit Court of Appeals.

The Court: What is that modification?

Mr. Carson: Perhaps you and I disagree as to whether it is a modification.

The Court: Is this in this same memorandum?

Mr. Carson: That is in this same memorandum.

The Court: Of December 6th?

Mr. Carson: No. It is a memorandum we gave your Honor yesterday dated December 7th, our memorandum in support of defendants' request for Grand Jury minutes.

The Court: Oh yes, the typewritten one.

Mr. Carson: I don't know whether that contains the language of the Circuit Court of Appeals that we called your Honor's attention to. Yes; it is on page 4.

[fol. 1646] When Judge Hand was a member of that Court in United States v. Alpert he concurred in the expression of the majority opinion:

"The veil of secrecy surrounding the Grand Jury proceeding may safely be lifted where justice so requires."

That simply supports our statement, which I take it your Honor would accept as the law, that it rests in your Honor's discretion whether it should be lifted in a discovery proceeding in a case of this immense scope where the plaintiff has the advantage of accumulating the material for many years.

The Court: I don't think that is any modification of Judge Learned Hand's views. You see this veil of secrecy being lifted is one thing, but giving the defendants in an antitrust suit the copy of the Grand Jury minutes is a little different. I think you are wasting time on that, Mr. Carson.

I do not like to have a closed mind but if I do have one I might as well say so rather than have you labor long on it.

Mr. Carson: Yes, thank you.

The Court: But I really am not open to persuasion.

Mr. Carson: Let me then suggest to your Honor, instead of my going further with that point, that I suspend it now on your Honor's statement without prejudice to any application which a deposition may justify.

The Court: That is right.

Mr. Carson: The Government also argues against this application on the ground of the work-product rule of Hickman v. Taylor. That is very clear. We don't want work product if we correctly understand the words; that is to say, we are not calling for summaries of statements [fol. 1647]. The Court: I would not be disturbed just because it was new and different, but in addition to that it seems to me there is a fundamental difference between getting certain papers that you know you are going to get, and that you know something about, and designated in some affirmative way, and just looking through all the other fellow's papers, a few presumptively relevant, for you to see if you can find something to help your defense.

Mr. Carson: That is a "fishing expedition" that is inherent in our training at the Bar, of course, but it seemed to us the new rules attempted to eliminate that and permit counsel on both sides to range through files which have any probability of relevance at all.

The Court: Let us see what the other side say.

Mr. Bennett: If your Honor please, may I first clear out of the air, if we can, two things which I think require no argument. The first one relates to the request that there be an examination of the minutes of the Grand Jury. I thought I understood your Honor to rule that you were not going to grant any such examination.

The Court: You understood correctly.

Mr. Bennett: Then I may leave that with this statement; that if your Honor should, by any chance, change his mind we think it is an extremely important subject and we should brief it thoroughly.

The Court: I have decided that already with the reservation that Mr. Carson stated. He made the reservation, not a very comprehensive one, but I shall be willing to reconsider it if some occasion arises to do it, and I don't want to make a ruling that would preclude them from ever raising the question again. But I have decided it now and it would take considerable argument to get me to take a different view later on.

Mr. Bennett: Very good, your Honor.

Honorable Alfred E. Modarelli, United States District Judge, District of New Jersey, Newark 1, New Jersey.

Re: United States v. The Procter & Gamble Company, et al.

Civil Action No. 1196-52

MY DEAR JUDGE MODARELLI:

In connection with the defendants' pending motions to compel disclosure of transcripts of testimony before the New Jersey federal grand jury which investigated the soap and synthetic detergents industry prior to the filing of this civil action, I respectfully call your attention to the recent ruling of Judge James M. Carter in United States v. Standard Oil Company of California, et al., Civil No. 11584-C, S.D. Calif., C. Div., which I believe is precisely in point.

On March 30, 1956 Judge Carter granted the Government's motion and sustained its claim to privilege as to certain interrogatories of the defendants which sought to require the Government to make available federal grand jury transcripts. As you will recall, Judge Carter in Pre-Trial Memo. No. 1, dated July 6, 1955, had ordered the disclosure of the testimony of those grand jury witnesses who would consent to disclosure. On December 13, 1955, however, the Government moved the court for an order denying the defendants access to the transcripts of testimony of any grand jury witnesses. In support of this motion the Attorney General filed a formal claim of privilege asserting the privileged status of the transcripts of the grand jury testimony. The Attorney General based his claim of privilege on his determination that disclosure of the transcript of testimony of any witness before either of the two federal grand juries which had conducted investigations prior to the filing of that civil case would be prejudicial to the grand jury system and not in the public interest. Thereafter, at the hearing on January 16, 1956, this claim of privilege was withdrawn and a new claim was filed based on the same grounds urged by counsel for the Government in the motions now pending before you. A copy of this modified claim of privilege is enclosed.

[fol. 1705] With respect to the Government's motion in the Standard Oil Case, the minutes of the court, dated March 30, 1956, state:

The Court having heretofore taken under submission the motion of plaintiff, filed December 13, 1955, for ruling sustaining the claim of privilege filed herein by the Attorney General on December 13, 1955, as modified by the claim filed January 16, 1956, in connection with certain interrogatories of defendants which sought to require plaintiff to make federal grand jury transcripts available, and the Court having duly considered this matter; now

It is ordered that said motion of the plaintiff is granted and the claim of privilege is sustained.

A copy of this letter is being sent to counsel for each of the defendants in the Soap case.

Sincerely yours, Stanley N. Barnes, Assistant Attorney General, Antitrust Division.

DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA, CENTRAL DIVISION

STANDARD OIL COMPANY OF CALIFORNIA; SHELL OIL COMPANY;
The Texas Company; Richfield Oil Corporation; General
Petroleum Corporation; Tide Water Associated Oil Company; Union Oil Company of California; and The Conservation Committee of California Oil Producers, Defendants.

CLAIM OF PRIVILEGE

Privilege is claimed for all transcripts of the testimony of all witnesses before the federal grand juries impaneled in the Southern District of California, Central Division, Los Angeles, California, in the years 1939 and 1947, which made inquiries concerning possible violations of the federal anti-trust laws by persons in the petroleum industry. This privilege I now assert to fulfill the Attorney's joint responsibility with the courts to protect the integrity of grand jury processes. The assertion of privilege is based on a careful consideration of the effects of the disclosure of transcripts of testimony of grand jury witnesses upon the public interest in the proper administration of justice.

My claim of privilege here is rooted in the established policies underlying non-disclosure of grand jury transcripts. One of the important reasons for the long standing public policy against disclosure of grand jury proceedings and [fol. 1707] testimony is "to encourage free and untrammelled disclosures by persons who have information with respect to the commission of crimes," United States v. Rose, 215 F. 2d 617, 628, and that "those who testify may feel free to speak the truth without reserve," Goodman v. United States, 108 F. 2d 516, 519, 522. This is essential to the effective administration of justice.

The suggestion that there can be no harm in disclosing the testimony of those witnesses who will consent overlooks the difficult position in which such witnesses may be placed.

Employees of the defendants and persons who do business with them, to whom the continued good will of the defendants is important, may feel compelled to agree to the disclosure of matters thought to have been given in strictest confidence, rather than to invite or risk the defendants' displeasure. The decision of the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in the Goodman case, supra, makes this clear beyond dispute.

The Department of Justice holds the transcripts of Grand Jury testimony as a trustee for the benefit of the people. The privilege against disclosure of such transcripts is that of the government, and not of the witnesses, and cannot be waived by consent of the witnesses. It is the obligation of the government to protect witnesses from any form of pressure or compulsion to disclose what was said in the privacy of the Grand Jury. Acquiescence in the proposed order would constitute notice to every future witness in a grand jury proceeding that he may be confronted with the choice of disclosing his testimony or risk offending an employer, or business associate, or other person whose continued good will is important to his economic welfare. Under such circumstances, there would be a strong incentive for the witness to refrain from giving testimony which would be detrimental to the interests of economically powerful potential defendants. It would also tend to intimidate those who might otherwise give testimony against racketeers, mobsters and gangsters, thereby subverting the entire grand jury system.

For these reasons, the disclosure by the Department of Justice of the transcripts of testimony of witnesses before grand juries for use of defendants in this civil case would be prejudicial to the efficient and effective use of grand juries as instrumentalities for the detection and investigation of crimes, and would thus be prejudicial to our grand jury system and contrary to the public interest. Accordingly, by virtue of the authority vested in me, and for the reasons given, I assert the privileged status of said transcripts of testimony.

Respectfully, (S.) Herbert Brownell, Jr., Attorney General.

Civil No. 1196-52

GENTLEMEN:

Reference is made to the amended order dated and filed in the above-entitled cause on August 21st last. The only purpose of this letter is to find out whether the plaintiff has produced as directed in the last paragraph of the amended order. Your early attention to this inquiry will be appreciated.

If the plaintiff has not produced, the court will enter an order dismissing the complaint as provided in the amended order.

Very truly yours, Alfred E. Modarelli.

C.A. No. 1196-52

MY DEAR JUDGE MODARELLI:

I am in receipt of your letter of September 6, 1956. In response, I state that on August 24, 1956 I telephoned Mr. Daniel Friedman, one of counsel of record for the Department of Justice in this cause. I asked Mr. Friedman whether the Department of Justice would produce for the inspection of Lever Brothers Company the transcripts of the Grand Jury testimony pursuant to the order of the Court as amended on August 21, 1956. Mr. Friedman advised me that the Department of Justice would not produce the documents.

Accordingly, I respectfully suggest that the condition stated in the aforesaid amended order has not been fulfilled and that it is appropriate that an order of dismissal be entered pursuant to the plaintiff's motion and the Court's amended order of August 21.

A form of order is enclosed for your consideration.

Sincerely, Abe Fortas.

Re: United States v. The Procter & Gamble Company, et al.

Civil No. 1196-52

DEAR JUDGE MODARELLI:

Earlier this week and prior to your letter of September 6, we had prepared a motion for a judgment dismissing the action, which motion was to be filed today. The proposed motion referred to your order of July 23, 1956, to the plaintiff's motion of August 16, 1956, and our answer thereto, and to your order of August 21, 1956. The motion also alleged that the Grand Jury transcripts of testimony had not been delivered, and attached an affidavit, dated September 5, 1956, that Robert D. Larsen, one of our associates, requested production of such transcripts on August 24, 1956, and production was refused. The motion also tendered to Your Honor a judgment dismissing the action.

In view of Your Honor's letter, it seems unnecessary to file the motion today and sufficient to enclose Mr. Larsen's affidavit and to state that the transcripts of the Grand Jury testimony were not produced on or before August 24, 1956—or for that matter after that date. We are enclosing the proposed judgment which was for attachment to the motion, which we had prepared and we are hereby tendering such judgment for your signature.

Sincerely, Kenneth C. Royall.

Civ. Action No. 1196-52

DEAR JUDGE MODARELLI:

We have your letter of September 6th with reference to the amended order dated and filed in the above entitled cause on August 21, 1956 on motion of the plaintiff.

In response to the inquiry contained in your letter may I state that the plaintiff has not produced the transcripts of the Grand Jury testimony referred to in the last paragraph of the aforesaid order. Counsel for plaintiff confirmed to the undersigned on August 24, 1956 that plaintiff had not produced such material and did not propose to produce it.

Accordingly, it seems appropriate, as suggested in your letter, that an order dismissing the action pursuant to the provisions of the aforesaid order of August 21, 1956 should be entered. We enclose herewith a proposed form of order to that effect.

Respectfully, Mathias F. Correa.

[Title omitted]

BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFF'S MOTION FOR PRODUCTION
BY THE PROCTOR & GAMBLE COMPANY OF DOCUMENTS
PURSUANT TO RULE 34 OF THE RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE.

a) Names of Parties and Nature of Proceedings

This is a Motion by the plaintiff, The United States of America, for an Order requiring The Proctor & Gamble Company, one of the defendants in the above-entitled action under the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C., Sec. 4), to produce certain designated documents for inspection, copying and photographing.

b) Statement of Facts

The documents to be produced are designated in Exhibit A attached to the Motion for Discovery and Production. The documents were produced by this defendant pursuant to subpoenas issued in the course of an investigation before the Grand Jury for the District of New Jersey in 1951 and 1952, and have been returned to said defendant. The documents are designated in Exhibit A by numbers given them by The Procter & Gamble Company prior to their production before the Grand Jury.

As set forth in the Motion and in the Affidavit in support of the Motion, the designated documents constitute or [fols. 1723-1724] contain evidence relating to the subject matter involved in this pending action.

c) Statement of Questions of Law

Since this Motion is filed pursuant to and in conformity with Rule 34 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, the Plaintiff is aware of no questions of law raised.

d) Argument

The Motion and the supporting Affidavit show that the documents for which an Order is sought are specifically designated and constitute or contain evidence relating to matters which are relevant to the subject matter involved in the pending action.

The Motion thus meets the requirements of the Rules of Civil Procedure. Rules 34 and 26(b) of the Rules of Civil Procedure for the District Courts of the United States.

It is respectfully submitted that the Motion should be granted.

THE DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY

Civil Action No. 1196-52

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Plaintiff,

v.

THE PROCTER & GAMBLE COMPANY, COLGATE-PALMOLIVE-PET
COMPANY, Lever Brothers Company, and The Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc., Defendants.

BRIEF IN OPPOSITION TO PLAINTIFF'S MOTION FOR PRODUCTION BY DEFENDANT, THE PROCTER & GAMBLE COMPANY, OF DOCUMENTS PURSUANT TO RULE 34 OF THE RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE.

I

Names of Parties and Nature of Proceedings

On December 11, 1952, plaintiff filed its complaint in this civil action under the Sherman Act. Plaintiff has now filed a motion dated March 6, 1953, for an order requiring defendant, The Procter & Gamble Company (hereinafter sometimes called "Procter"), to produce on or before March 30, 1953, the documents listed in its motion papers. As will hereinafter appear, Procter urges that plaintiff's motion be denied on the ground of failure to show good [fol. 1731] cause therefor and on the ground of abuse of the process of this Court.

II

Statement of Facts

The facts are fully recited in the affidavit of Kenneth C. Royall,* filed simultaneously with this brief and made a part hereof, and are discussed in the argument.

III

Questions Involved

1. Whether the instant motion should be denied because the plaintiff has failed to show good cause why the documents sought should be produced for inspection.

2. Whether the issuance of and action under the Grand Jury subpoenas and the plaintiff's purpose behind the issuance thereof constitute an abuse of process which requires the denial of plaintiff's motion in this civil action for production of documents originally obtained through the Grand Jury process.

IV

Argument

A. Plaintiff's Motion Must Be Denied Since Good Cause Is Not Shown.

Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure requires an affirmative showing of good cause. A conclusory allegation [fol. 1732] is not sufficient. Leven v. Birrell, S.D. N. Y., 17 Fed. Rules Serv. 515 (1952); Hickman v. Taylor, 3 Cir., 153 F. 2d 212 (1945); aff'd 329 U. S. 495 (1947); 4 Moore's Federal Practice (2d Ed. 1950) 2442-3. Good cause cannot be shown when the moving party already is in possession of the information sought. G. & P. Amusement Co. v. Regent Theater Co., N. D. Ohio, 9 F. R. D. 721 (1949); Heffer v. National Airlines, Inc., S. D. N. Y., 18 Fed. Rules Serv. 34.33, Case 1; Garrett v. Faust, E. D. Pa., 8 F. R. D. 556 (1949); 4 Moore's Federal Practice (2d Ed. 1950) 2451. Furthermore, since plaintiff has had possession of the great bulk of Procter documents now asked for a year and a half and has made copies and notes, though improperly, of selected papers, it would seem obvious that plaintiff is already in possession of the information sought and has no cause for production under Rule 34.

In addition, plaintiff had these documents in its possession at the very time the plaintiff filed its motion to produce and delivered them to Procter five days thereafter pursuant to a previous demand.

B. The Process and Orders of This Court Have Been Abused And Disregarded.

This abuse took several forms. Even that part of the Grand Jury subpoenas which was sustained by the District Court was so broad, vague and indefinite as to be unreasonable, unduly burdensome and oppressive and thus to constitute an abuse of the process of this Court and an illegal search and seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment, and should never have been sustained. While this position was fully presented before Judge Forman, we had no right of appeal from his interlocutory order. But we reserved [fol. 1733] our rights to contest the subpoenas later, and we now reassert our objections on the grounds set out in the brief filed before Judge Forman on June 1, 1951, which brief states our views and is hereby referred to and made a part of this brief.

After the Grand Jury subpoenas were partially sustained the process of this Court was abused and the instructions of Judge Forman were disregarded in several respects, including, among other things, the unconscionable delay in the return of Procter's documents, the making of copies of and notes concerning such documents, and the transporting of such copies and notes to Washington, D. C. See Application of Bendix Aviation Corporation, S. D. N. Y., 58 F. Supp. 953 (1945); United States v. Philadelphia & R. Ry. Co., E. D. Pa., 221 Fed. 683 (1915); In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum of the Standard Sand & Gravel Company, N. D. W. Va. (unreported, May 1, 1950).

The matter we particularly urge upon this Court is that the Government abused the process of the Court by using criminal subpoenas before a Grand Jury in order to prepare for this civil action.

The retention of Procter's papers beyond any time reasonably necessary for the presentation of them to the Grand Jury and the failure to return papers from time to time, as was contemplated by Judge Forman and as would have been possible so far as the Grand Jury was concerned, shows that the primary purpose of the Grand Jury subpoenas and the investigation was to secure evidence and prepare for a civil case.

Moreover, the taking of copies and notes to Washington, D. C., was unnecessary for the purpose of presentation to the Grand Jury and strongly suggests that a civil action was the real and ultimate purpose of the Grand Jury proceeding. [fol. 1734] Added to these circumstances are the others referred to in the affidavit in opposition to this motion, including the lapse of only a few days between the discharge of the Grand Jury and the filing of the civil complaint; the parallel between the arguments of Government counsel on the motions to quash and the allegations of the civil complaint; and then the exact identity of the documents produced under the Grand Jury subpoenas and those now sought for the civil action by this motion under Rule 34.

To top it all we have the statements of responsible Department of Justice representatives themselves that the filing of the present civil complaint results from a thorough investigation, "including extensive grand jury proceedings", and that no one in the Department was unhappy over the turn of events when the Grand Jury was discharged without returning an indictment. The only reasonable interpretation of their language is that the Government was using the Grand Jury investigation to prepare for the civil case.

This use of the subpoenas is, we submit, illegal, and the documents so obtained cannot be used in a civil action brought by the Government. Our position, so far as specific decisions are concerned, seems to be largely, if not entirely, a matter of first impression. Nevertheless, we believe it to be logical, morally right with respect to this defendant and others similarly situated, and a matter of great importance in the protection of fundamental rights. We are here attacking a method which has been employed by the Department of Justice for several years past, illegally in our opinion, and it is important with respect to the rights of all litigants that its legality be determined and that a decision be made as to the remedies which a defendant may employ to protect itself.

[fol. 1735] Historically, the Grand Jury has been deemed a bulwark of the liberties of the people, a protection against the oppressions of political power, and a shield against the over-zealous accusations of the prosecutor. United States v. Kilpatrick, W. D. N. C., 16 Fed. 765 (1883); Charge to Grand Jury, C. C. Cal., 30 Fed. Cas. 992, 993 (1872). Is its function now to be subverted so that it becomes an instrument for the oppression of our individuals and corporations in behalf of the sovereign and in behalf of over-zealous prosecutors?

It has become common knowledge in recent years that the Department, which has been denied the subpoena power by Congress, has circumvented its legal limitations by subverting the Grand Jury process for the purpose of preparing its civil cases. Persons who at one time or another were associated with the Department have said so. For example, Robert A. Nitschke, formerly with the Antitrust Division, writing on "Procedure in Antitrust Investigations", in Illinois Law Forum (Winter, 1950) 593, states, p. 605:

"It [the Grand Jury] has been and is the chief investigating weapon in the Division's arsenal; used as such, and not just for the purpose of obtaining indictments. The Division has not hesitated, where the facts so indicated, to recommend the return of 'no true bills,' or to allow the grand jury term to lapse without action, or, where the proof does not develop a case appropriate for criminal action, to file eventually a civil suit."

How revealing of the inquisitor's mind is this statement. A recent and rather dramatic attempt to apply the device we condemn occurred in In Re Investigation of World Arrangements, Etc., Misc. No. 19-52, D. C. D. C., on [fol. 1736] January 12, 1953, where the Government is reported to have offered to withdraw a criminal investigation in favor of civil litigation but on condition that the companies would agree to the production of documentary material which they were required to produce under an existing order based on Grand Jury subpoenas. Was this not a bland effort to "trade" out of the defendants the same unfair benefit by a threat of continuing the criminal proceedings and a bald admission of the purpose of the criminal investigation. Counsel for the companies are reported to have rejected the offer. New York Times, January 13, 1953, pp: 1, 20.

Those who are unburdened by the inquisitor's mantle and who have given mature thought to the misuse of the Grand Jury process have uniformly condemned the practice. Among those so condemning it are leaders of the Bar, and former Government counsel.

We are not speaking of mere matters of form when we attack the misuse of the Grand Jury process. Substantial rights are in jeopardy. If the Government in preparing for a civil antitrust case were compelled, like any other plaintiff, to abide by the civil rules, defendant would have notice of examinations, it would have the benefit of protective orders provided by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, it would have the right of cross-examination, and it would have the opportunity to take defensive measures of its own, both by way of examination and by discovery of documents. Finally, under the civil rules a defendant would be able to act as a party to a civil action instead of under the embarrassment and uneasiness which most people feel when under criminal investigation, even though those investigated are entirely innocent and the investigation is for ulterior civil purposes.

[fol. 1737] If the Government is to be permitted to misuse the criminal process, as it has done here, these fundamental protections disappear. Through the Grand Jury device, the Government commits witnesses to testimony which may be distorted or even incorrect because of the lack of any right of counsel to stop unfair and misleading questions or to conduct an explanatory cross-examination. Moreover, the Government seizes and studies documents which the defendant is unable to examine, at least for many months. The Government in effect enjoys a two year handicap in the preparation of its case. When it files its complaint, it is substantially prepared for trial, whereas often the defendant scarcely knows what the case is about. Finally all this is done with the defendants and employees under the shadow which comes from a criminal investigation. Often, as in this case, this shadow is so unjustified that even after a one-sided and undefended presentation a Grand Jury fails to find even a prima facie case.

It is no answer for the Government to say that such an abuse of the criminal process is necessary since the Department has been denied the use of the subpoena power. In America the Department is still as subject to the law as any American individual or corporation. Furthermore, the Justice Department has no right to complain of the law. Without any improper use of a criminal subpoena, the Government in a civil case has far greater facilities for investigation in preparation of a civil complaint than does a private plaintiff. These include facilities of the Complaint Bureau and of the FBI as well as those of its large staff of attorneys, accountants and economists.

The existence in this case of an abuse of process appears clear from the authorities. In Re National Window Glass Workers, N. D. Ohio, 287 Fed. 219 (1922); McNair's [fol. 1738] Petition, 324 Pa. 48, 58-9, 187 Atl. 498, 503 (1936); Application of Bendix Aviation Corporation, S. D. N. Y., 58 F. Supp. 953 (1945). That the use of the Grand Jury process for any purpose other than the securing of an indictment is an abuse of that process is well illustrated in the National Window Glass Workers case, supra. There, a Grand Jury in the Southern District of New York returned an indictment for violation of the Sherman Act and the proceedings were ready to be set for trial. The Government thereupon instituted another Grand Jury investigation in the Southern District and subpoenas were served. Defendants moved to quash on the ground that the investigation was not in good faith but merely for the purpose of obtaining evidence in advance of trial of the indictments. When the Government admitted this to be true, the subpoenas were quashed. Thereafter subpoenas were issued requiring production of documents before a Grand Jury in the Northern District of Ohio in an investigation admittedly related to the same conspiracy charged in New York. The Government attorneys, however, now said that their purpose was to ask for a new indictment in the Ohio district although they still intended to try the New York indictment first and to try the Ohio indictment only if the New York prosecution failed for want of jurisdiction. Under these circumstances, the Ohio Federal Court found that the dominating object of the Ohio investigation was to examine witnesses and obtain documents for the New York case, that an abuse of its process existed, that it had power to correct the abuse, and that the subpoenas should be vacated conditionally. In so holding the court said (p. 225):

[fol. 1739] "A supervisory duty not only exists, but is imposed upon the court, to see that its grand jury and its process are not abused, or used for purposes of oppression and injustice."

If it is an abuse of process to utilize a Grand Jury proceeding for the purpose of preparing for trial of another criminal case, a fortiori, it is an abuse of process to utilize a Grand Jury proceeding for the purpose of preparing for civil litigation. Accordingly, we submit that there has been an abuse of the process of this Court, that the abuse is so gross as to amount to a violation of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments, and that this Court has power to correct the abuse.

C. The Only Effective Remedy for the Abuse in This Case Is an Order Denying Plaintiff's Motion for Production and Inspection and Suppressing the Use of Any Information Obtained by Plaintiff in the Grand Jury Proceedings.

There being an injurious abuse of process as shown above, there must be a remedy. We do not believe that our Courts will see the rules flouted by one litigant, even the Government, at the expense of another litigant without some effective corrective action.

So far as we know, there are no civil cases clearly deciding the full point in question. Nevertheless, we believe that such authority as exists in the criminal field and to some extent in certain civil cases demonstrates logically and by analogy that the remedy we seek is appropriate.

It is not enough to admonish the Government for its abuse of process and to advise it to sin no more. It does not help the party that has been injured, and it does not deter the same injury to someone else in the future. In fact [fol. 1740] a mere reprimand encourages other abuses by graphically demonstrating that nothing is going to be done in the future to stop the abusive practices. Take the Sand & Gravel case, supra, where there was a disapproval of an abuse similar to one feature of the abuses in this case. That authority did not deter the Government from doing here a similar act to that condemned in the Sand & Gravel case. A more decisive remedy than a "slap on the wrist" is required, if unfairness is to be remedied and fundamental rights are to be protected in the future.

There is no way in which the Department of Justice can retrace its step and correct the injury already done in this case. The remedy must take the form of suppression of evidence or documents illegally obtained by abuse of process. This has been the remedy often afforded in criminal cases, and it has been the remedy in some civil cases. Rogers v. United States, 1 Cir., 97 F. 2d 691 (1938); Schenck v. Ward, D. Mass., 24 F. Supp. 776, 778 (1938); United States v. Wong Quong Wong, D. Vt., 94 Fed. 382 (1899); Ex parte Jackson, D. Mont., 263 Fed. 110 (1920); appeal dismissed on stipulation sub nom. Andrews v. Jackson, 9 Cir., 267 Fed. 1022 (1920).

As Mr. Justice Frankfurter has said, "The history of liberty has largely been the history of observance of procedural safeguards." McNabb v. United States, 318 U. S. 332, 347 (1943); see also Malinski v. New York, 324 U. S. 401, 414 (1945). The preservation of these procedural protections is in the province of the courts and ultimately in that of the Supreme Court. McNabb v. United States, supra.

In Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U. S. 385 (1920), Justice Holmes refused to permit the Government [fol. 1741] ment to benefit from the retention of copies of papers which were seized in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The same remedy should be employed here. It is immaterial whether the conduct shown in this case amounts to a violation of the Fourth Amendment, since evidence obtained by or during the course of wrongful acts by Government agents has been excluded even where it did not amount to a Constitutional violation. The exclusion has been, and should here be, on the theory that such a remedy was necessary to the maintenance of civilized standards of procedure by enforcement officers. McNabb v. United States, supra.

United States v. Wallace Co., 336 U. S. 793 (1949), supports the denial of plaintiff's motion in this case rather than otherwise. In the Wallace case, the documents in question had been produced pursuant to Grand Jury Subpoena and the Grand Jury had indicted. The indictment was dismissed because women had been excluded from the panel, and the documents were ordered returned. In a subsequent civil case the district court declined to require the production of papers which had previously been produced before the Grand Jury. The Supreme Court reversed but did so on the ground that the exclusion of women from the panel bore only a remote relationship to an alleged wrongful search and seizure. The Court, however, speaking through Mr. Justice Black, was careful to point out that no wrongful acts by Government agents were involved.

The implications of the Wallace case, therefore, tend to support the proposition that the documents might well be withheld from the Government where, as in this case, there has been a continuous pattern of abuse by representatives of the Government.

In a situation like ours, where procedural safeguards have been ignored, the important fact is not only the injury [fol. 1742] to the defendant but the injury to the administration of justice. As Mr. Justice Douglas has said in Ballard v. United States, 329 U. S. 187 (1946), where the Supreme Court in exercising its supervisory power, set aside a conviction before an improperly constituted jury panel, "The injury is not limited to the defendant—there is injury to the jury system, to the law as an institution, to the community at large, and to the democratic ideal reflected in the processes of our courts" (p. 195).

Accordingly, this Court should redress the wrongs done to Procter by reason of the abuse described and, by dismissing this motion, should see to it that the Department of Justice in this case and in future cases will take no benefit at all from misusing the Grand Jury process.

Conclusion

In conclusion, the plaintiff's motion should be denied because (1) plaintiff did not show relevancy but stated mere conclusions without facts, and it does not need the information sought since it had possession of the papers when the motion was served and for the preceding eighteen months, (2) as to the documents now demanded by plaintiff the subpoenas were improperly sustained in the criminal proceeding, (3) the Court's orders and instructions were not complied with in many respects, including, among other things, the improper copying of Procter's papers and the delay in returning them, (4) above all else, the Government utilized criminal process for the purpose of investigation and discovery in a civil action and in order to evade the protective requirements of the rules and statutes governing discovery. From every aspect, the Government's action abused the process of the Court and was unduly expensive [fol. 1743] to the Government and to the defendant, wa-unjust, burdensome and oppressive to the defendant and violated its statutory and constitutional rights, including those derived from the Fourth and Fifth Amendments. As to this motion the only proper course and adequate remedy is to deny to the plaintiff the documents described in the motion.

We respectfully request that the plaintiff's motion for production and inspection under Rule 34 be denied.

EXHIBIT "A" TO BRIEF

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT
NEW JERSEY

Civil Action No. 1196-52

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Plaintiff.

v.

THE PROCTER & GAMBLE COMPANY, COLGATE-PALMOLIVE-PET
COMPANY, Lever Brothers Company, and The Association of American Soap and Glycerine Producers, Inc., Defendants.

Affidavit of Kenneth C. Royall

STATE OF NEW YORK,
County of New York, ss:

KENNETH C. ROYALL, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

1. I am a member of the firm of Dwight, Royall, Harris, Koegel & Caskey, one of the attorneys for the defendant,

The Procter & Gamble Company (hereinafter sometimes called "Procter"), and am fully familiar with the proceedings heretofore had in the above entitled matter and with the circumstances recited herein relating to a certain Grand Jury investigation of various companies in the soap industry which preceded commencement of the above entitled case.

[fol. 1745] 2. This affidavit is made on behalf of Procter in opposition to plaintiff's motion dated March 6, 1953, for an order requiring Procter to produce for inspection on or before March 30, 1953, certain documents.

3. Plaintiff's motion is opposed on three principal grounds: (a) plaintiff has made no showing of good cause sufficient to entitle it to production of the documents listed in the motion papers, (b) plaintiff had heretofore utilized the Grand Jury proceeding in this District for the principal, if not the sole, purpose of obtaining for use in this civil action, the documents described in the motion papers and other evidence, as a consequence of which the process of this Court has been abused and plaintiff is not entitled to use such documents in this action, and (c) the subpoenas duces tecum served in the said Grand Jury proceeding were harassing and burdensome and plaintiff's actions in the Grand Jury proceeding did not comply with the rulings and instructions of the Court in the Grand Jury proceeding, as a consequence of which the process of this Court has been abused and the use of the documents sought is precluded.

Good Cause Has Not Been Shown

4. Plaintiff's motion and affidavit show no cause why this motion should be granted other than a conclusory allegation that the papers called for are relevant or material to the issues of this cause and are needed in preparation of its case.

[fol. 1746] 5. Plaintiff, in consequence of Procter's compliance with the aforesaid Grand Jury subpoenas duces tecum, has had possession, illegally as we contend, of the documents now sought, with relatively few exceptions, for approximately eighteen months and has improperly made copies of and taken notes on certain of said documents, presumably those which it considered relevant to this case.

6. At the time the present motion was served, Procter, contrary to the recital in said motion, did not have physical possession, custody or control of the documents sought, such documents then being in possession of the plaintiff and not being delivered to Procter until five days after service of the said motion.

B

An Abuse Of Process Has Been Committed In That Plaintiff Has Utilized The Grand Jury Proceeding For The Purpose Of Preparing For A Civil Action.

7. Without making any prior request of Procter for inspection of any of its documents, plaintiff in May, 1951 caused and procured the issuance of two Grand Jury subpoenas duces tecum returnable before the Grand Jury of this District sitting here in Newark, New Jersey.

8. On or about May 31, 1951, Procter and certain other companies which had been served with similar subpoenas moved for orders quashing and vacating the said subpoenas on the ground they were so sweeping and indefinite as to be unreasonable, oppressive and a violation of the Fourth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

[fol. 1747] 9. These motions were heard before Honorable Philip Forman. Upon the argument the subpoenas were substantially modified and limited by Judge Forman. The transcript and other papers relating to the Grand Jury proceeding are filed in the Clerk's office of this Court, Index No. Cr. 174-51, 175-51, 176-51, and 177-51.

(1) Delay in Presenting Papers to Grand Jury.

10. In response to a question of the Court on the hearings of the motions to quash as to whether Government counsel expected to go before the Grand Jury on June 12, 1951: Mr. Walker Smith, who represented the Government, expressed the hope that he would "have some of those easy-to-get documents in" (Tr. 67).

11. At the same hearings in June, 1951, Mr. Smith stated that he considered "time to be of the essence", that he hated "to have a Grand Jury come in and not have business". He also inquired whether the companies could produce some of the documents on or before July 10 and stated that, if counsel would let him know in advance as to what material they had "we will be able to plan our session for the 10th much better" (Tr. 69-70, 379).

12. With certain minor exceptions, Procter completed his production of the documents called for by the subpoenas, as modified by the Court, on or about September 21, 1951, which was within the time prescribed by the Court.

13. Despite Mr. Smith's statements indicating that he desired to proceed with dispatch and his insistence on prompt delivery of the documents covered by Judge [fol. 1748] Forman's order, yet I am informed and believe that there was a delay in presenting any substantial amount of Procter's documents or those of any of the defendants to the Grand Jury. Plaintiff knows the exact facts as to what documents were actually presented to the Grand Jury, and at what time, and if the plaintiff wishes to controvert this allegation, he should disclose the facts to this Court, with Procter's counsel having the right of cross examination.

(2) Undue Retention of Papers.

14. Each time Procter delivered papers pursuant to the said subpoenas, it addressed a letter to the Grand Jury stating that the documents were being delivered to the Grand Jury and requested that the receipt for such documents be signed "by the Grand Jury or its representative" and that the documents be promptly returned to the company after they had been seen by the Grand Jury. At the time of each delivery, a representative of the Attorney General signed the receipt "For the Grand Jury".

15. On various occasions after all or a part of Procter's papers were produced, I, as counsel for Procter, again demanded, both orally and in writing, that the papers be returned. Among such demands were those contained in letters to Mr. Smith, dated July 18, 1951, August 2, 1951, August 10, 1951, August 13, 1951 and August 22, 1951, and at various other times.

16. Nevertheless, with the exception of a very few documents, the Government did not return any of Procter's documents until March 10, 1953. Indeed, no offer was even made to return these documents until February 12, 1953, [fol. 1749] and such offer was made coupled with a proposal for a stipulation being entered into providing that the Government have the opportunity to make "such further copies and notes of documents produced pursuant to grand jury subpoena as we may desire".

17. The return of these papers was approximately twenty months after the first papers were produced by Procter for the Grand Jury, about eighteen months after the whole bulk delivery was completed and three and a half months after the Grand Jury had failed to return any indictment or presentment against Procter or others and had been discharged. The return also included certain documents produced pursuant to three additional subpoenas, served in June, 1952, as modified by order of this Court.

18. The complaint in this civil action was filed on December 11, 1952, three months before Procter's documents were returned to it.

(3) Copies of Procter's Documents Were Made and Taken to Washington, D. C.

19. Some months ago, I was informed by Mr. Smith that the latter had caused copies of and notes from certain of Procter's documents to be made and that such copies and notes had been taken to Washington, D. C. The making of such copies and notes was confirmed in a letter of February 12, 1953 from the Department in which is suggested a stipulation giving it the opportunity to make "such further* copies and notes of documents produced pursuant to grand [fol. 1730] jury subpoena as we may desire". It seems to me reasonable to conclude that the making of these copies and notes and the taking of them from the site of the Grand Jury, all of which I consider improper, was with the purpose of preparing for this civil suit.

(4) Alacrity With Which Civil Suit Was Brought.

20. As I have said, the Grand Jury was discharged on November 25, 1952, and the civil suit was filed on December 11, 1952. Since the civil suit is of a complicated nature, it would appear to be a necessary inference that it was in the course of preparation during the period in which the Government had possession of Procter's documents, pursuant to the Grand Jury subpoena.

*Emphasis supplied.

(5) Expressed Attitude of Government Counsel During and After Grand Jury Proceedings.

21. During the course of the argument on the motions to quash the Grand Jury subpoenas, Mr. Smith, on behalf of the Government, presented contentions in support of various paragraphs of the subpoenas in which he described probable issues which would arise. Comparison of these statements and the allegations of the complaint in this civil action show the close similarity, thus tending to indicate that the Department of Justice had a civil action in contemplation at the time the Grand Jury proceeding was initiated.

22. In the Department of Justice Press Release of December 11, 1952, issued at the time the civil complaint was filed, the then Acting Assistant Attorney General in [fol. 1751] charge of the Anti-trust Division stated that "The filing of the complaint results from a careful and thorough investigation of this industry, including extensive grand jury proceedings".

23. Shortly after the Grand Jury was discharged without returning any indictment, Mr. Smith stated orally to me that he would not say or intimate what happened before the Grand Jury, but that no one in the Department was unhappy over the turn of events. The civil suit was filed immediately thereafter.

(6) Similarity Between This Motion and Grand Jury Subpoena.

24. This motion under Rule 34 calls for all of the documents produced under the Grand Jury subpoenas and also for some documents which were produced for inspection only of representatives of the Department of Justice, for example, the minute books. As to these, Judge Forman did not require actual production before the Grand Jury since he did not want the defendants to run the risk of losing custody of such irreplaceable papers (Tr. 295-8; 311-2). The fact that the motion calls for all documents produced or inspected also tends to indicate that a civil action was always in contemplation.

25. All these circumstances as well as others seem clearly to indicate that the object of the Grand Jury proceedings was to obtain information, documents and testimony for preparation of the civil action, and I so allege on information and belief.

[fol. 1752] (7) Unreasonableness of Utilization of Grand Jury Proceedings for Preparation of Civil Case.

26. In civil proceedings the Government, like any other plaintiff, must abide by the civil rules. Under these rules defendant would have notice of examinations. It would have the benefit of protective orders provided by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Defendant would stay current with the plaintiff as its formal investigation proceeds. All documents and other evidence which plaintiff acquires would be immediately available to the defendant. The defendant would have the right of cross examination and the opportunity to take defensive measures of its own by way of examination and discovery.

27. By using the Grand Jury proceeding in preparation of a civil case, the Government secures the unfair advantage of having an ex parte proceeding. It commits witnesses to testimony before the Grand Jury without any benefit to the defendant by way of cross examination for the purpose of clarification or correction. It can compel production of documents at distant places without being subject to the protective orders obtainable in civil proceedings. It secures production of documents pursuant to Grand Jury subpoena without showing good cause, as is required by the civil rules. It secures and studies documents and obtains evidence which the defendant is unable to examine, at least for many months and which in this case the plaintiff even now insists on concealing while time runs on and pleadings are demanded by the plaintiff. The Government secures a time handicap, in this case two years, in the preparation of its case and when it files its civil complaint may be substantially prepared on matters of which the defendant has little [fol. 1753] or no knowledge. The civil rules provide specific safeguards against all those things which are deliberately sought and obtained by the plaintiff by what we allege to be gross abuse of process.

Since The Grand Jury Subpoenas Were Harassing and Burdensome and Plaintiff's Actions In The Grand Jury Proceedings Were Illegal An Abuse of Process Occurred In That Proceeding Precluding the Use of the Documents Sought In This Civil Action.

(1) The Documents Were Illegally Obtained In The Grand Jury Proceeding.

28. As appears from Procter's motion on file in the Grand Jury proceeding, Procter moved for an order quashing and vacating the subpoenas duces tecum on the grounds, inter alia, that (a) "the Court had no jurisdiction" to issue them and (b) they were "so broad, sweeping, vague and indefinite as to be unreasonable, unduly burdensome and oppressive, and thus constitutes an abuse of the process of this Court, an illegal search and seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States".

29. Although this Court substantially modified and limited the said subpoenas it did not quash them in their entirety. Procter could not then appeal from this Court's order on said motions and it had no opportunity to appeal thereafter since no indictment was found. Nevertheless, Procter at all times preserved its right to challenge the illegality of said subpoenas. Therefore, in this civil case [fol. 1754] in which for the first time in a definite adversary action an effort is made to use the Grand Jury documents, Procter contends that these documents were illegally obtained and cannot in this proceedings be used or ordered produced.

(2) Plaintiff's Conduct In The Grand Jury Proceeding Was Illegal.

30. The Court ruled on the hearings of the motions to quash that the documents submitted should be returned promptly and counsel for the Government agreed that they would be returned as quickly as possible. This is substantiated by the following colloquies:

(a) The Court stated that the documents were to be returned "as quickly as the situation permits" (Tr. 742). It stated that it did not want the Government to retain at one time a greater accumulation of documents than could be "digested" or "assimilated" (Tr. 752). The Court stated that "there must be some time limit" to the retention of papers. Government counsel "ought to have a control over the accumulation of them—and one of the ways to prevent that would be to give back some of the papers as they come in." If the situation should become clogged, the Government was not to "take any more papers" for the time being (Tr. 756-7).

(b) Mr. Smith stated to the Court that he and his staff would run through the documents "just as fast as possible and return them, either subject to recall" or subject to taking photostatic copies. He did not "want to keep them around. We will get them right back as fast as possible" (Tr. 297). Mr. Smith stated that he had no desire to keep papers as such and would "make every effort to return documents just as quickly as we can do" (Tr. 745). He [fol. 1755] stated that there was "absolutely no question" of the companies "getting them back" and as fast as he found that a document had "no possible bearing" he would return the document "at once" (Tr. 748, 750). He promised that he and his associates would be "just as quick as we can and not retentive for the sake of being retentive" (Tr. 753). Thereafter, Mr. Smith said that the return of some of the papers might be possible within "two or three weeks" (Tr. 755).

31. Despite the foregoing rulings by the Court and assurances by Mr. Smith, Procter's documents, with the small exceptions previously noted, were not returned until March 10, 1953, more than eighteen months after the rulings and statements referred to in paragraphs 29 and 30 and over three months after the Grand Jury was discharged.

32. The Court ruled on the hearings of the motions to quash that the papers submitted, including those which were of a highly confidential nature (See, in general, Tr. 30, 36, 90, 134, 173, 212-4, 522, 544) and also including all other papers, should be retained in the rooms provided in the Federal Building in Newark, New Jersey, and counsel for the Government agreed. This is substantiated by the following colloquies:

(a) The Court contemplated that examination of the documents would occur in the Grand Jury room or rooms adjacent thereto, for it stated that it thought "that the course of examination of them, either inside the Grand Jury room or in the anteroom, as has come to be the practice, would have to be followed in order for the processes to be accomplished at all" (Tr. 738).

[fol. 1756]. (b) ~~Mr. Smith~~ stated to the Court that rooms had been made available to him "which are interior rooms which are kept absolutely locked at all times, and a very considerable quantity of the documents will be kept in a room which * * * for purposes of safety I am very pleased, has even no windows. It is an absolutely interior room, and I believe is a very safe room and will be kept completely locked, and the documents there will be kept in the filing cabinets * * * I believe that there is no means of safekeeping which we have forgotten, and they all, your Honor, will be continuously observed" (Tr. 751-2).

33. Nevertheless, as I have previously pointed out, counsel for the Government caused copies and notes of certain of the said documents to be made and taken to Washington, D. C. Such papers would normally have been seen or handled by persons not directly concerned with the Grand Jury proceedings. In my opinion, if plaintiff wishes to explain the facts in this and preceding paragraphs, it should do so by specific evidence subject to cross examination.

34. I submit that the above described conduct of Government counsel amounted to a violation of the letter and spirit of this Court's order and shows an abuse of the process of this Court.

34. I further submit that plaintiff has failed to show good cause why its motion should be granted, and that by reason of the facts stated herein, including the use of a [fol. 1757] criminal subpoena to investigate a prospective civil case, the plaintiff's motion should be denied.

Sworn to before me this 17th day of March, 1953.

[fol. 1758] IN UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE
DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY

[Title omitted]

SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF PLAINTIFF'S MOTION FOR PRODUCTION BY DEFENDANT THE PROCTER & GAMBLE COMPANY OF DOCUMENTS PURSUANT TO RULE 34 OF THE RULES OF CIVIL PROCEDURE—March 23, 1953

Names of Parties and Nature of Proceedings

This is a Motion by the Plaintiff, The United States of America, for an Order requiring The Procter & Gamble Company, one of the defendants in the above-entitled action under the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C., Sec. 4), to produce certain designated documents for inspection, copying and photographing. The Procter & Gamble Company asks that the Motion be denied for reasons set forth in its brief in opposition filed March 18, 1953.

Supplemental Statement of Facts

Additional facts material to the issues raised in Defendant's Brief are set forth in an affidavit by Walker Smith dated March 21, 1953, which is attached hereto and made a part hereof.

ARGUMENT

a) Plaintiff has shown good cause for the issuance of the Order requiring production

[fol. 1759] The showing of good cause required by Rule 34 varies according to the facts of the particular case and considerations of practical convenience. There are no universally applicable horn-book rules. Moore's Federal Practice, on which the defendant relies, states (4 Moore's Federal Practice (2 Ed. 1950), pp. 2449-2450):

"The party seeking inspection is required to show 'good cause therefor'. Considerations of 'practical convenience' should play the leading role in determining what constitutes good cause. What is good cause depends on the particular facts of each case; as Judge Mize said in one decision [Leach v. Greif Bros. Coop.] erage Corp., D.C. S.D. Miss. 1942, 2 F.R.D. 444, 446].

"It is difficult to lay down a definition of good cause that would apply to every particular case. There is a wide latitude . . ." (Emphasis supplied)

In Hickman v. Taylor, 153 F. (2d) 212 (3 C.C.A. 1945), on which the defendant also relies, the Court of Appeals for this circuit said (note 4, p. 216): "As to what precisely is meant by good cause the cases do not indicate with any degree of certainty . . ." The Court went on to quote the language of Judge Mize, quoted by Moore above.

In the case before the Court, the documents called for are stated under oath to be "relevant or material to the issues of this cause and . . . needed to aid the plaintiff in the preparation of its case, and particularly in support of the allegations contained in Paragraph 34 of the complaint". (Affidavit of March 5, 1953). They are identified by numbers placed upon them by the defendant when it produced them pursuant to the grand jury subpoenas. It then produced them only when ordered to do so by Judge Forman after an extended hearing on its motion to quash the subpoenas. At that hearing counsel for the government (plaintiff here) outlined various possible violations of the antitrust laws to be investigated and set forth the relevance of these documents to such possible violations and the government's need for them to determine the existence of such possible violations, all to Judge Forman's satisfaction.

[fol. 1760] The defendant states in its Brief and Affidavit in opposition to the present motion that those statements of possible violations and the allegations of the complaint in this case are "closely similar" (Defendant's Affidavit, p. 21, par. 21; Defendant's Brief, p. 5). Defendant cannot say that the documents which it was ordered to produce because of their relevance to the descriptions of violations made in the argument are not equally relevant to the allegations of the complaint. Neither can it say that documents which were needed to determine the existence of such possible violations are not now needed to establish the allegations in the complaint.

Under these circumstances, no practical convenience would be served by the Court's requiring the plaintiff to repeat in affidavit form the detailed statements made at the hearing on the subpoenas duces tecum.

The cases which defendant cites in support of its horn-book statement, "A conclusory allegation is not sufficient" (Defendant's Brief, p. 3) fail to support the application of that statement to the facts of the instant case.

Defendant cites Hickman v. Taylor, 153 F.(2d) 212 (3 C.C.A. 1945), in which, as we have already shown, the Court of Appeals recognized that the requirements for an adequate showing of good cause vary from case to case. In that case the Court simply refused to require the production by a lawyer and his clients of written and oral statements which had been made to the lawyer by third party witnesses.

Defendant also cites Leren v. Birrell, 17 Fed. Rules Service 515 (S.D. N.Y. 1952). In that case movant had filed an affidavit indicating counts of the complaints to which it claimed designated documents were relevant. The Court required production of some of those documents and did not require the production of others. Among those it did require to be produced were certain documents of which it said, "... relevancy has been specifically established and a proper foundation has been laid under the [fol. 1761] requirement of a previous ruling by Judge Clancy. . . ." In the instant case, as we have stated earlier, all the documents have been found relevant and a foundation laid by the ruling by Judge Forman concerning the possible violations which the defendant declares are closely similar to the allegations of the complaint.

The cases which defendant cites in support of its horn-book statement, "Good cause cannot be shown when the moving party already is in possession of the information sought" (Defendant's Brief, p. 3) similarly fail to support the application of that statement to the facts of the instant case.

Defendant cites G & P Amusement Co. v. Regent Theater Co., 9 F.R.D. 721 (N.D. Ohio 1949). But in that case, though the Court states as dictum, "Good cause is not shown when the mover has the information sought or can obtain the documents or information therein through other methods than the rules of discovery," it held the movant was entitled to have the documents produced because it could not obtain the documents in any other way.

Defendant cites Hefter v. National Airlines, Inc., 18 Fed. Rules Service 34.33 (Case 1 (S.D. N.Y. 1952)). But in that case the Court's denial of production of certain records was based on the point that movant's reason for their production was to establish that they were "records kept in the regular course of business".

Defendant cites Garrett v. Faust, 8 F.R.D. 556 (E.D. Pa. 1949). But in that case the Court simply refused to require one private litigant to produce his income tax returns for copying by another in the absence of a special showing of necessity, or of undue prejudice, hardship or injustice to the movant by the denial.

Defendant finally cites 4 Moore's Federal Practice (2nd Edition 1950) 2451. But that passage simply quotes the dictum from the G & P Amusement case, quoted above, and suggests comparison in a footnote to cases which all [fol. 1762] turn on special circumstances not present in the case before this Court, including Garrett v. Faust, discussed above; Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U. S. 495 (1947), where the Court stated a special showing should be made to require the production of "work product of a lawyer"; United States v. Five Cases, 9 F.R.D. 81 (D. Conn. 1949), where the Court stated a special showing should be made to require production of a chemical analysis of a type not provided for in the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act under which the action was brought; and Dallamco v. Great Lakes S.S. Co., 9 F.R.D. 77 (N.D. Ohio E.D. 1949), where movant was denied an order requiring production of hospital records which were "primarily under (his) control" and of statements of witnesses.

Defendant has cited no case holding that the fact that a party has, at one time, had access to documents excludes such party from the discovery procedure provided by Rule 34.

b) There has been no abuse of the process or orders of this Court

Defendant's claim that Judge Forman's order improperly sustained the subpoena duces tecum for production to the grand jury (Defendant's Brief, p. 13) is both untimely and presented in the wrong forum. If defendant believed Judge Forman's order to have been improper (Defendant's Brief, p. 13) or to have permitted an abuse of process and an illegal search and seizure (Defendant's Brief, p. 3), it should have sought a remedy at the time of the order.

Defendant's claim that the attorneys in the Department of Justice or the Government abused the process of the Court (Defendant's Brief, pp. 4-13) ignores the structure of the antitrust laws and the authority duly established to enforce them, as well as material facts in the proceedings relating to the documents to be produced under the Motion.

The Sherman Act (15 U.S.C., Sections 1-7), which is the act under which the present civil action was brought and the principal act mentioned in the authorizations of the Attorney General for conduct of grand jury proceedings, is primarily a criminal act since its basic sections (Sections 1, 2 and 3) define crimes. But it contains also an [fol. 1763] ancillary section (Section 4) investing the district courts of the United States with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of the act.

Judge Carpenter set out a careful analysis of the statute in his opinion in United States v. Swift, et al., 188 Fed. 92, 96 (N.D. Ill. E.D. 1911):

.. * * * The Sherman Act is primarily a criminal statute. Its title announces its purpose. Section 1, 2, and 3 declare certain things to be illegal, and prescribe punishment for their doing. The equitable remedy provided by section 4 does not authorize the Circuits Courts [District Courts] of the United States to enjoin restraints of trade, as such; it does not subject to the processes of a court of chancery, contracts, combinations in the form of trusts or otherwise, or conspiracies or monopolies, in restraint of trade, either definitely or indefinitely. On the contrary, it invests the Circuits Courts [District Courts] of the United States with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of this act; and it is a well-known fact that the courts of the United States have no jurisdiction, except such as is conferred upon them by Congress. Here the jurisdiction of the equity courts is made dependent upon the criminal sections. If sections 1, 2, and 3 were repealed by Congress, there would be nothing left of the law to which Sections 4 and 7 could apply. It is impossible to give effect to the equity sections without reference being had to the criminal sections. It authorizes the processes of the Chancery Court to be used only to prevent the carrying out of that which is declared in the prior sections to be criminal. It follows, therefore, that unless that which is sought to be enjoined is a violation of the act under one of the preceding sections, in other words, that, unless that which is sought to be enjoined is a crime, it cannot be enjoined, because it is only that which is made a crime by the statute which is subject to equity jurisdiction." (Brackets and emphasis added).

There is no necessity in this case for a decision as to the propriety of investigation before a grand jury designed solely to prepare for a civil action under Section 4 of the Sherman Act, since the investigation was begun and carried on with both criminal enforcement and civil enforcement in mind. The purposes of the investigation were, first, determination whether there were violations of Sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Sherman Act or any of them, or of any other Federal antitrust laws, and, second, determination as to what action should be taken to enforce those laws [fol. 1764] through criminal proceedings, civil proceedings or both. The investigation and all proceedings incident to it, including the grand jury proceeding, were begun and carried on pursuant to and within instructions to accomplish those purposes. (March 21st affidavit of Smith).

Because the Sherman Act's Section 4 by virtue of which civil actions may be brought, is an ancillary section, dependent, as Judge Carpenter stated in the passage we have quoted, upon the criminal sections, it is difficult to see how any investigation could ever be begun with the sole purpose of bringing a civil case.

Assuming for purposes of argument that grand jury proceedings might be undertaken with the sole purpose of preparing for a civil case under Section 4, such action would not constitute any abuse of process or be in any way improper. The dependency of Section 4 upon Sections

1, 2 and 3 requires a determination as to whether there have been criminal violations before a civil action can be brought under Section 4. The structure of the Sherman Act itself thus contemplates that there shall be investigation as to whether a crime has been committed before a civil action can be begun. There cannot therefore be any impropriety in the use by the Government in enforcing the Sherman Act of any of the proper methods of investigation as to whether a crime has been committed. The propriety of the use of a grand jury to obtain evidence for use in other types of civil suits brought by the Government under statutes other than the Sherman Act is not before this Court.

Defendant states that there is no judicial authority for its claim that the use of a grand jury in the course of the investigation which eventuated in a civil case is an abuse of process.

Defendant does cite In re National Window Glass Workers, 287 Fed. 219 (N.D. Ohio 1922), but that case simply refused to allow a grand jury in one jurisdiction to be used to supplement the work of a grand jury in another jurisdiction which had already determined the [fol. 1765] existence of a violation of the law.

Defendant cites also a state court case, McNair's Petition, 324 Pa. 48, 187 A.2d 498 (1936). But that case merely held that a Pennsylvania state grand jury cannot go into matters not concerned with violations of the law.

Defendant cites also Application of Bendix Aviation Corporation, 58 F. Supp. 953 (S.D. N.Y. 1945). But that case encouraged the use in a civil Sherman Act case in the District of New Jersey of evidence obtained before a grand jury for the Southern District of New York. After the New York grand jury had been dismissed without action, the Court refused to require that the Government return documents produced before the grand jury until the Government had had an opportunity to apply to the New Jersey court in the civil proceeding for an order covering those documents. Judge Meany of this court subsequently sanctioned the use of the documents in the civil case when he ordered that, if, after the documents had been returned to the defendants, they failed to produce them at trial, copies could be introduced by the Government: (Civil case No. 2531, Order March 19, 1945).

In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 4 F. Supp. 283 (E.D. Pa. 1933), was a case in which the District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania sanctioned the use in a civil proceeding in the District of New Jersey of testimony before a grand jury of that (Pennsylvania) court. The court refused to recognize a claim that the testimony was taken before the grand jury solely for use in the civil proceeding.

Defendant contends that the making of copies and notes concerning the documents and the transporting of such copies and notes to Washington, D. C. constituted an abuse of process.

The Attorney General is by law responsible for enforcement of the Sherman Act in either criminal or civil proceedings or both. (5 U.S.C.A. 291; Statement of Organization and Functions of the Department of Justice, 11 Fed. Reg. Vol. 177 at pp. 177A-102 through 177A-114; Re-[fol. 1766] organization Plan No. 2 of 1950, note following 5 U.S.C.A. 291). He is required directly by law as well as by the necessities of his office to be "at the seat of the government" (5 U.S.C.A. 291). He has by statute been given seven Assistant Attorneys General (5 U.S.C.A. 295). In the performance of his responsibilities to enforce the Sherman Act, he has designated one of the seven Assistant Attorneys General to supervise all matters relating to the antitrust laws (Attorney General's Order No. 3732 and Supplements).

Acceptance of defendant's contention that there was impropriety in the making of copies and notes and the taking of them to Washington, D. C. would require that the Attorney General and the Assistant Attorney General, Antitrust Division, either make repeated personal visits to every judicial district in which grand jury proceedings are being conducted, or fail to perform the duties and responsibilities in the enforcement of the Sherman Act imposed on them by law.

Defendant's contention that there was an unconscionable delay in the return of its documents ignores the facts of the matter. The documents which defendant produced pursuant to the subpoenas were, with few exceptions, copies made by photostatic or other duplicating processes or tabulations prepared by it in lieu of production of original documents. During the time these documents were in the Government's hands defendant knew that any of the documents for which it had specific need would be made available to it on request. On three occasions documents for which it stated it had specific need were delivered to its representatives. (March 21 Affidavit of Smith). Defendant thus suffered no appreciable harm by the Government's retention of the documents. Though defendant had made several general requests for the return of the documents prior to the dismissal of the grand jury on November 25, 1952, it made no request of any sort for any of these documents during the period from November 25, 1952 until February 25, 1953. When, on February 25, 1953 defendant did request their return, counsel for the plaintiff offered [fol. 1767] to return them the next day but was informed by counsel for defendant that it would notify the Government when it desired to take delivery of the documents. Thereafter arrangements were made to deliver the documents to counsel for defendant on March 6, 1953 at Newark. On March 6, 1953 an attorney for the Department and an attorney for defendant at the latter's request began a detailed check of the documents as a part of their return. That process was carried on pursuant to the request of the attorney for defendant until March 10, 1953 at which time the return of the documents was completed. (March 21 Affidavit of Smith). There was no "unconscionable" delay; in fact there was no improper delay in the return of the documents.

The cases which defendant cites in support of its contentions as to the actions of attorneys for the Government concerning the documents fail to support its position.

In Application of Bendix Aviation Corporation, supra, as has been pointed out above, the court did not—because of delay in return of documents or any other action of the Government—deprive the Government of their use in a civil proceeding. Instead, the court refused to require their return until the Government had had an opportunity to procure orders concerning such documents from the court having jurisdiction of the civil proceeding.

In United States v. Philadelphia & R. Ry Co., 221 F.

683 (E.D. Pa. 1915), which defendant also cites, an indictment was quashed because a member of the bar, appointed as a special assistant, took stenographic notes of testimony before the grand jury. There is no longer any possibility of a court so holding, because 18 U.S.C. 556 and 6(d) Fed. Rules Cr. P. provide for the making of a stenographic transcript.

Defendant also cites In re Grand Jury Subpoena Duces Tecum of the Standard Sand & Gravel Co., N.D.W.Va. (unreported May 1, 1950). The Government had taken [fol. 1768] original grand jury records out of the jurisdiction of the court, but the judge stated that "no pre-meditated disregard" of the process of the court was intended, and held that this did not constitute an unreasonable seizure, and that it did not invalidate the use of the records in evidence before the grand jury or in the trial of any case.

- c) There is neither factual justification nor legal precedent for immunization of the defendant against civil relief under the Sherman Act.

Since section b) of this brief has already demonstrated that there have been no abuses of process concerning the documents to be produced pursuant to this Motion, there is no need to discuss in detail the sanction of immunization sought by defendant.

All the cases which defendant cites as to this proposition (Defendant's Brief, pp. 11-12) involve illegal searches and seizures and failure to accord due process in the obtaining of documents. In United States v. Wallace, 336 U. S. 793, 799 (1949), the Supreme Court determined there had been no illegal search or seizure and no failure to accord due process, and refused to immunize the defendant against use of the documents in subsequent proceedings.

Conclusion

It is respectfully submitted that the Court should enter the Order prayed for in Motion.

AFFIDAVIT

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, SS:

Walker Smith, being duly sworn, says:

(1) That he is now and has been at all times material herein an attorney in the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice;

(2) That he was authorized and instructed by his superiors in the Department of Justice to carry on a complete investigation of those engaged in the production, processing, distribution, purchase and sale of soap, other detergents or materials used in their manufacture, so that a determination could be made as to whether there were violations of Sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Sherman Act or any of them or of any other Federal antitrust laws, and as to what action should be taken in performance of the duties of the Attorney General and of the Department of Justice to enforce those laws through criminal or civil proceedings or both;

(3) That the investigation and all proceedings incident thereto, including the grand jury proceeding in the District of New Jersey in which subpoenas duces tecum addressed to the Procter & Gamble Company were issued, were carried on pursuant to and within those instructions;

(4) That the documents produced by the Procter & Gamble Company in response to subpoenas duces tecum as modified by orders of this Court, and which are the documents described in Exhibit A to the Motion for Discovery and Production of Documents under Rule 34 now before the Court, were, with few exceptions, copies made by photostatic or other duplicating processes or tabulations prepared by the Procter & Gamble Company in lieu of production of original documents;

(5) That prior to the production of said documents pursuant to said subpoenas and on many occasions thereafter, he informed the Procter & Gamble Company through its [fol. 1770] counsel and other representatives that any of said documents for which it had specific and immediate need would be made available to it upon request;

(6) That on three occasions during the time said documents were held pursuant to subpoenas duces tecum, counsel for Procter & Gamble informed counsel for the Government that the Procter & Gamble Company had immediate need for specific documents and on each such occasion said documents were delivered to representatives of the Procter & Gamble Company;

(7) That no request for the return of all or any of said documents was made to him between November 25, 1952, when the Grand Jury was dismissed, and February 25, 1953; that on February 12, 1953 he, on behalf of the Department, telephoned counsel for the Procter & Gamble Company concerning the return of the documents and suggesting procedures to minimize the burden of discovery procedures; that thereafter on February 25, 1953 at a conference between him and counsel for the Procter & Gamble Company he offered, pursuant to a request then made by counsel for the documents, to return them to next day and was informed by counsel that counsel would notify him when it desired to take delivery of the documents; that thereafter arrangements were made to deliver the documents to counsel at the Post Office Building in Newark on March 6, 1953; that on March 6, 1953 an attorney for the Department and an attorney for the Procter & Gamble Company at the latter's request, began a detailed check of the documents as a part of their return; that that process was carried on pursuant to the request of the attorney for the Procter & Gamble Company until March 10, 1953, at which time the return of the documents was completed.

BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF MOTION BY DEFENDANT, THE PROCTER &
GAMBLE COMPANY, TO SUPPRESS CERTAIN DOCUMENTS—
June 4, 1953

I. Names of Parties and Nature of Proceedings

This brief is in support of a motion by Procter for an order forbidding the plaintiff to use against Procter in this case for any purpose prior to or during trial the documents and papers described in the motion.

II. Statement of Facts

The facts are fully recited in the affidavit of Kenneth C. Royall, dated June 4, 1953, and the affidavit of Kenneth C. Royall, dated March 17, 1953, filed in opposition to plaintiff's motion under Rule 34 and incorporated herein by reference and made a part hereof.

[fol. 1788] III. Question Involved

Whether this Court should prohibit plaintiff from using against Procter in this case for any purpose prior to or during the trial the documents and papers referred to in the motion.

IV. Argument

Use by Plaintiff Against Procter for Any Purpose in This Cause of the Documents and Papers Referred to in the Motion Should Be Suppressed

In Procter's brief dated March 17, 1953, filed in opposition to plaintiff's motion under Rule 34, which is hereby incorporated herein by reference and made a part hereof, the arguments establishing the abuses of process by plaintiff which occurred during and since the Grand Jury proceedings in 1951 and 1952 are fully set forth. As there appears, the subpoenas duces tecum, pursuant to which the documents were submitted, were, even as modified, illegal. Moreover, the instructions of Judge Forman were disregarded by plaintiff in several respects, including the unconscionable delay in the return of Procter's documents until over three months after discharge of the Grand Jury, the making of copies, notes, etc. of such documents and the [fol. 1789] transporting of such copies, notes, etc. to Washington, D. C., all of which was contrary to law and to Judge Forman's orders. Furthermore, the circumstances show that the Government abused the process of this Court by using the Grand Jury proceedings and the criminal subpoenas to prepare for this civil action, the effect of which was to deprive Procter of the protections granted by the civil rules with respect to discovery proceedings, including notice of examinations, the right to cross examination and the opportunity to take other defensive measures.

The authorities collected in Procter's brief dated March 17, 1953 strongly indicate, we submit, that an abuse of process has been committed.

The only effective remedy for such abuse is to prohibit use by plaintiff against Procter for any purpose in this case of any of the documents and papers referred to in the motion. As pointed out in the brief of March 17, 1953, remedy short of this would encourage rather than deter future abuse of the process of this Court.

We shall not reargue this point at length since our contentions have been fully presented in our brief dated March 17, 1953 and on the oral argument in opposition to plaintiff's motion under Rule 34.

We do again contend that the Fourth Amendment of [fol. 1790] the Constitution has clearly been violated. We also again contend that Procter is entitled to the relief sought herein, whether or not it should be decided that there is a violation of the Fourth Amendment. Evidence obtained by or during the course of wrongful conduct by Government agents may be excluded even where the wrongful conduct does not amount to a violation of the Constitution, the theory being that such a remedy is necessary to the maintenance of civilized standards of procedure. McNabb v. United States, 318 U. S. 332 (1943).

Conclusion

As appears in our prior brief and herein, the remedy of exclusion of the evidence obtained during the course of the Grand Jury proceedings is necessary in this case and is the only effective remedy which may be applied. Procter's motion should therefore be granted in all respects.

BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF MOTION BY DEFENDANT, THE PROCTER &
GAMBLE COMPANY, FOR RETURN OF COPIES AND OTHER WRITINGS.—June 4, 1953

I. Names of Parties and Nature of Proceedings

This motion is for an order requiring plaintiff and its counsel to return to the defendant, The Procter & Gamble Company (hereinafter sometimes called "Procter"), all copies of, all excerpts from, and all notes, analyses, summaries and other writings concerning certain documents which were delivered to a Grand Jury of this Court in 1951 and 1952. These same documents—but not the copies, etc.—are the subject of the Rule 34 order entered by this Court against Procter on May 27, 1953, requiring photostatic [fol. 1797] copies to be delivered by Procter to the plaintiff as designated by plaintiff.

II. Statement of Facts

The facts are fully recited in the affidavit of Kenneth C. Royall, dated June 4, 1953, and the affidavit of Kenneth C. Royall, dated March 17, 1953, submitted in opposition to plaintiff's motion under Rule 34.

III. Question Involved

Whether Procter is entitled to the return by plaintiff and its counsel of all copies of, all excerpts from, and all notes, analyses, summaries and other writings concerning the documents which are the subject of the order entered by this Court on May 27, 1953.

IV. Argument

Procter Is Entitled to the Return of All Copies, Notes, Excerpts, Analyses, Summaries and Other Writings.

The documents were previously submitted to the Grand Jury under an order of Judge Forman of this Court, acquiesced in by counsel for the Government, requiring the documents to be kept in certain rooms in the Federal Building in Newark, New Jersey. In violation of this ruling, counsel for the Government made copies and notes of cer-[fol. 1798] tain of said documents and transported them to Washington, D. C. where they would normally have been handled and seen by persons not directly concerned with the Grand Jury proceedings. This was illegal and improper and constituted an abuse of process, and Procter is entitled to the return of such copies and notes and of any excerpts, analyses, summaries and other writings relating to such documents.

As Justice Holmes pointed out in Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U. S. 385, 392 (1920), evidence or knowledge "gained by the Government's own wrong" is not merely forbidden to be "used before the Court but * * * it shall not be used at all."

Procter is also entitled to the return of the copies, notes, excerpts, analyses, summaries and other writings, because the Grand Jury proceedings in connection with which the originals thereof were obtained has long since terminated without any indictments against Procter or any of the companies which became defendants in this case. United States v. Wallace Co., 336 U. S. 793, 801 (1949); Application of Bendix Aviation Corporation, S.D. N.Y., 58 F. Supp. 953 (1945).

As Mr. Justice Black said in the Wallace case, with respect to an order of the district court which required the [fol. 1799] return of photostatic copies, "Return of the photostats, like return of the originals, necessarily follows from the dismissal of the indictment" (p. 801).

In addition to Procter's legal right to have the copies, notes, excerpts, analyses, summaries and other writings and plaintiff's legal duty to return them, there are at least three practical reasons justifying their return:

(a) There is no reason why plaintiff should retain these writings when this Court has ordered Procter to furnish to plaintiff copies of such of the original documents as plaintiff designates.

(b) As set forth in the affidavit submitted herewith, the return of the writings would simplify compliance with this Court's order of May 27, 1953, by eliminating the necessity of photostating many of the documents and by alleviating the time and trouble which would be required, and

(c) As is also set forth in the affidavit, an order for return of these writings would enable Procter to determine which of the documents plaintiff has considered sufficiently pertinent or relevant to copy, note, summarize or analyze. Despite the lapse of six months since the beginning of the action and over two years since the Grand Jury was impaneled plaintiff has not yet given Procter any information as to what documents it considers relevant or intends to rely [fols. 1800-1803] upon. Granting of this motion would be the first step in the essential process of limiting the documentary aspects of the case.

Conclusion

Procter's motion should be granted in all respects.

PLAINTIFF'S BRIEF IN OPPOSITION TO MOTION BY DEFENDANT
THE PROCTER & GAMBLE COMPANY TO SUPPRESS CERTAIN DOCUMENTS—June 15, 1953.

Names of Parties and Nature of Proceedings

This is a motion by defendant The Procter & Gamble Company for an order forbidding the plaintiff to use against said defendant for any purpose prior to or during trial:

- (1) documents and papers, submitted by Procter to the Grand Jury and covered by plaintiff's Motion under Rule 34 granted by the Court May 27, 1953, or submitted by anyone else (including defendants other than Procter) to the Grand Jury or to plaintiff pursuant to subpoena duces tecum;
- (2) all copies of, all excerpts from, and all notes, analyses, summaries and other writings concerning any of the documents referred to in (1) above; and
- (3) all papers, documents and other like evidence obtained, directly or indirectly, by reason of information or knowledge derived wholly or partially from the papers mentioned in (1) and (2) above.

The plaintiff, the United States of America, opposes the motion.

[fol. 1805] Statement of Facts

The material facts were set forth in the affidavits in support of and in opposition to, the plaintiff's Motion for Production of Documents under Rule 34, heard by the Court on March 25, 1953, decided by Opinion filed May 11, 1953, and granted by the Court's order of May 27, 1953. Those affidavits were the affidavits for plaintiff by Walker Smith, dated March 27, 1953 and March 5, 1953 (which are hereby incorporated herein and made a part hereof) and for this defendant by Kenneth C. Royall, dated March 17, 1953. This defendant's affidavit by Kenneth C. Royall dated June 4, 1953, submitted in support of this Motion to Suppress, incorporates by reference the last of these affidavits. It states also, indirectly, that the plaintiff's Motion for Production of Documents under Rule 34 was granted, a fact well known to this Court which granted the Motion.

Question Involved

Whether this Court should prohibit plaintiff from using against defendant Procter in this case for any purpose prior to or during trial the documents and papers referred to in said Motion (and described in the Nature of Proceedings in this brief).

Argument

This motion is based on contentions which were advanced by this defendant in opposition to the plaintiff's Motion for Production under Rule 34 and were considered and rejected by the Court in connection with that Motion.

This defendant sought by opposing the Rule 34 Motion to prevent the Government from obtaining copies of documents, originally obtained from it by grand jury process, for use in preparing for and trying this case. It now seeks to prohibit the plaintiff from using those documents, and all documents obtained from others through grand jury process, in the preparation and trial of the case. The contentions by which the defendant supports the motion thus [fols. 1806-1808] are not only identical to those it raised in the Rule 34 proceeding, but are raised in an identical manner and for the same purpose.

Defendant's Brief in Support of this motion simply incorporates its brief in opposition to the Rule 34 motion and describes and refers to its arguments therein.

The plaintiff's Brief in support of its Rule 34 motion, dated March 23, 1953, set forth in detail the plaintiff's views as to the applicable law and facts. We hereby incorporate that Brief herein and make it a part of this proceeding.

Plaintiff's Brief in Opposition to Defendant's "Motion for Return of Copies and Other Writings", filed today, deals with defendant's same contentions raised with a slightly different purpose.

Since both those Briefs are in the Court's hands, we shall not burden the Court with reargument here.

Conclusion

Since this Motion raises the same contentions in the same manner and for the same purpose as the contentions raised in opposition to plaintiff's Rule 34 Motion, and since this Court rejected those contentions in granting plaintiff's Rule 34 Motion, it is respectfully submitted that this motion of this defendant should be denied.

PLAINTIFF'S BRIEF IN OPPOSITION TO DEFENDANT THE PROCTER & GAMBLE COMPANY'S "MOTION FOR RETURN OF COPIES AND
OTHER WRITINGS"—June 15, 1953

Names of Parties and Nature of Proceedings

This motion by defendant The Procter & Gamble Company seeks, as stated in the motion itself, "an order requiring plaintiff and its counsel to deliver to Procter all copies of, all excerpts from, and all notes, analyses, summaries and other writings concerning the documents which are the subject of the order of this Court on plaintiff's motion under Rule 34, entered on May 27, 1953." Though defendant entitles it, "Motion for Return . . ." it is not a motion for return since the copies, excerpts, notes, analyses, summaries and other writings which it seeks to have delivered by plaintiff to the defendant have never been in the possession of the defendant. The plaintiff, the United States of America, opposes the motion.

Statement of Facts

With one exception hereinafter mentioned, the material facts were set forth in the affidavits in support of, and in opposition to, the plaintiff's Motion for Production of Documents under Rule 34 heard by the Court on March 25, [fol. 1810] 1953, decided by opinion filed May 11, 1953, and granted by the Court's order of May 27, 1953. Those affidavits were the affidavits for plaintiff by Walker Smith dated March 21, 1953 and March 5, 1953 (which are hereby incorporated herein and made a part hereof), and for this defendant by Kenneth C. Royall dated March 17, 1953. This defendant's affidavit by Kenneth C. Royall of June 4, 1953 submitted in support of its present motion incorporates by reference the last of these affidavits and states also the additional fact (referred to as an exception above) that the motion under Rule 34 was granted by the Court's order of May 27, 1953.

Question Involved

Whether the defendant Procter is entitled to an order requiring plaintiff and its counsel to deliver to Procter all copies of, all excerpts from, and all notes, analyses, summaries and other writings concerning the documents which are the subject of the order entered by this Court on May 27, 1953.

Argument

This motion is based on contentions which were advanced by this defendant in opposition to the plaintiff's Motion for Production under Rule 34 and were considered and rejected by the Court in connection with that motion.

It is an effort to pursue further the theory that it is improper for the plaintiff, the Government, to utilize in this Sherman Act Section 4 Civil Action, materials and knowledge gained in the grand jury proceedings which were a part of the Government's investigation to determine whether or not Sections 1, 2 or 3 of the Sherman Act had been violated, a theory for which the Court found no precedent when granting the Rule 34 motion.

The motion is not directed at the documents which this defendant produced in the course of the grand jury proceedings. Those documents, which were the subject of the [fol. 1811] Rule 34 motion are and have long been in the defendant's hands. This motion asks that the Government be required to deliver to this defendant any and all copies of, excerpts from, and all notes, analyses, summaries and other writings concerning such documents which the plaintiff or its counsel may have.

The defendant cites no authority for the contention stated first in its brief, that it was illegal and improper and constituted an abuse of process for the Government's counsel to take to the offices of the Department of Justice in Washington, D. C., copies of, excerpts from, and notes, analyses, summaries and other writings concerning documents produced in the grand jury proceedings (Deft's Brief, pp. 2-3). It can cite no authority for the proposition since as we pointed out in brief and argument on the Rule 34 motion, a holding that such action was improper would make it impossible for the Attorney General, the Assistant Attorney General, Antitrust Division, and the attorneys in the Department of Justice properly to perform the duties of enforcing the Sherman Act imposed on them by law. The Attorney General as head of the Department of Justice is responsible for the enforcement of the Sherman Act, the direction of proceedings to determine whether there have been violations as well as proceedings to punish or to prevent and restrain such violations (5 U.S.C.A. 291; Statement of Organization and Functions of the Department of Justice, 11 Fed. Reg. Vol. 177 at pp. 177A-102 through 177A-114; Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1950, note following 5 U.S.C.A. 291). He is directed by law as well as by the necessities of his office to be "at the seat of the Government," Washington, D. C., and to maintain offices of the Department of Justice there (5 U.S.C.A. 291). Unless attorneys under him can bring to the offices of the Department of Justice in Washington, copies of, excerpts from, and notes, analyses, summaries and other writings concerning documents relating to violations of law, the Attorney General and his principal assistants must either perform their duties blindly by guess or absolute delegation [fol. 1812] or haphazardly by traveling to as many Districts where investigations are being carried on as time will permit. Neither Congress nor any court has ever contemplated that the Attorney General and his assistants should thus perform their duties of determining whether or not there have been violations of the Sherman Act, of determining what proceedings to institute to deal with such violations and of directing such proceedings.

Defendant's citation of United States v. Silverthorne, 251 U.S. 385, 392 (1920) (Def't's Brief, p. 3) adds no strength to its contention. The passage from which the defendant has patched together its quotations followed a determination by the Court that the facts in question had been obtained in a search carried out without warrant or process while the owners of the premises were being held under arrest so that they could not object to the search. Defendant's only authority for its claim that the Government's conduct in the instant case was improper is its own statement.

Defendant's second contention, that plaintiff should deliver to it any and all copies, notes, excerpts, analyses, summaries and other writings "because the Grand Jury proceedings in connection with which the originals were obtained has long since been terminated without any indictments against Procter or any of the companies which became defendants in this case" (Def't's Brief, p. 3), seeks, once again, to separate the Government's function of determining whether or not there have been violations of the Sherman Act from its function of carrying out proceedings to prevent and restrain such violations. As was set forth in briefs and argument in the Rule 34 proceeding, Section 4 of the Sherman Act, the section under which the instant civil action was brought, is simply an ancillary provision to Sections 1, 2 and 3 which establish and define crimes. The civil action may be brought only "to prevent and restrain violations" of the Act's criminal provisions. (15 U.S.C.A. § 4). Defendant's contention is that the Government should not have or use in preparing and trying the the civil action, copies, excerpts, notes, analyses, summaries, [fol. 1813] and other writings made in the course of proceedings in which it determined that the Sherman Act has been violated. There are no precedents so holding. And there should be none since the rule which defendant seeks to create would force the Government to prepare and try the civil action to prevent and restrain violations of the Sherman Act without benefit of working papers prepared by it in the course of the valid and proper proceedings in which it determined that the Sherman Act has been violated. Neither of the cases which defendant cites so holds.

United States v. Wallace, 336 U. S. 798 (1949) dealt with documents which originally came into the hands of the Government under process of a legally non-existent grand jury. Determination that the grand jury was legally non-existent was made in a proceeding seeking dismissal of an indictment which that purported grand jury had returned. In its incidental use of the language quoted by defendant at page 4 of its brief, "Return of the photostats, like return of the originals, necessarily follows from the dismissal of the indictment," the Court was merely stating that the Government could keep neither originals nor copies of documents which came to it under process which had no proper legal foundation. In the instant case the documents from which the copies, notes, excerpts, analyses, summaries and other writings sought by defendant were made, came to the Government under proper process of a duly authorized Grand Jury in the course of an investigation to determine whether the Sherman Act had been violated.

In Application of Bendix Aviation Corporation (S.D.N.Y. 1945), 58 F. Supp. 953, the Court of the Southern District of New York did not require the Government to deliver all copies, all notes, all excerpts, all analyses, all summaries, or all other writings concerning the documents in question. The Court permitted the Government to retain the original documents pending application for an impounding order in the District of New Jersey and simply [fol. 1814] required the Government to deliver photostatic copies of the documents to the movant for its use while the application was pending. And when the matter came before this Court in the District of New Jersey, Judge Meany sanctioned the Government's retention of copies—his order provided that though the impounding order for the originals was denied, the Government was authorized to introduce copies if the defendant failed to produce the originals at trial (Civil Case No. 2531, Order March 19, 1945). Application of Bendix thus is authority for the denial of the defendant's motion in the instant case.

Defendant reveals the actual purpose of its motion in what it calls its third "practical reason" for the motion at page 4, subparagraph (c); of its brief (see also page 3, paragraph 9, of the affidavit of Kenneth C. Royall dated June 4, 1953). That purpose is to probe into the thought processes of counsel for plaintiff in order to learn what documents counsel for plaintiff have heretofore chosen to copy, what excerpts and notes they have made, and how they have analyzed, summarized and reported in other writings as to the contents of documents.

Defendants thus are attempting through this motion to invade the professional privacy of the attorneys for the Government. They could not do so in a motion to enforce any discovery right established by the Rules of Civil Procedure. As the Supreme Court stated in Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 512 (1946):

... the general policy against invading the privacy of an attorney's course of preparation is so well recognized and so essential to an orderly working of our system of legal procedure that a burden rests on the one who would invade that privacy to establish adequate reasons to justify production through a subpoena or court order. That burden, we believe, is necessarily implicit in the rules as now constituted.

Defendants cannot in the instant situation make any showing to justify production since the documents concerning which they seek copies, notes, excerpts, analyses, summaries and other writings are already in their hands. This is not a situation where the invasion of professional [fol. 1815] privacy is an unfortunate incident to the obtaining of essential facts. Defendant here has the facts and is seeking to probe opposing counsel's thought processes without any justification at all.

Defendant's statements in its Brief that it has received no information as to what documents plaintiff considers relevant ignores plaintiff's Rule 34 motion and plaintiff's statements in connection with it. Furthermore, though counsel for defendant may not have received it at the time of filing its brief, counsel for plaintiff mailed to counsel for the defendant on June 4, 1953 an initial designation of documents to be copied pursuant to the order of May 27, 1953.

Counsel for plaintiff do desire to inform the Court that they contemplate that this defendant and all the other defendants in this case will at the proper time be entitled to designations of the documents on which the plaintiff intends to rely at trial. Counsel for plaintiff have on more than one occasion informed this defendant and the other defendants of plaintiff's intention to furnish them with such designations when they can practicably be prepared. The plaintiff hereby reiterates that statement. Attempts to prepare such listings at this time would serve no useful purpose for any one, but simply serve to burden and mislead everyone.

Defendant's other so-called "practical reasons" for the motion (Def't's Brief, p. 4, subparagraphs (a) and (b)) lend no justifying strength.

As to defendant's first "practical reason" (subparagraph (a), p. 4, Def't's Brief), there is no burden on the plaintiff to show why it should retain its working papers; there is a burden, as shown above, on defendant to establish adequate reasons why plaintiff should not retain its working papers inviolate and unrevealed. Nevertheless we have set forth in this brief compelling reasons why plaintiff should retain "these writings." The fact that plaintiff is entitled under the order pursuant to Rule 34 to have copies of documents with which to do further [fol. 1816] work, gives no justification for the order here sought which would divest it of working papers prepared earlier.

Defendant's second "practical reason" gives no justification. Since the order of May 27 provides that the plaintiff shall bear the expense of photostating and that the defendant may produce the documents for photostating either at Cincinnati or New York as it chooses, compliance with the order of May 27 casts no appreciable burden on the defendant and it has no appreciable need for simplification of compliance or alleviation of time and trouble caused it by the Order.

If the plaintiff were suing this defendant in a proprietary capacity or if the plaintiff were a private party, there would, thus, be no justification for the defendant's probing of plaintiff's counsel's thoughts by obtaining its working papers and the motion would have to be denied.

on that ground alone. Because the plaintiff is the United States of America suing in the governmental capacity of enforcing its laws, the motion should be denied for the further reasons that many of the copies, excerpts, notes, analyses, summaries, and other writings sought by the motion are confidential records of the Department of Justice, revelation of which is prohibited by Government regulation and which are therefore privileged. (Attorney General's Order No. 3464, Supplement No. 4, Revised January 13, 1953; Barron and Holtzoff, vol. 2, pp. 323-4.)

Conclusion

Since the defendant has shown neither legal nor factual justification for the motion and since the order sought would hamper plaintiff's preparation of its case by divesting it of working papers and would violate public policy by compelling revelation of plaintiff's counsel's professional privacy and by compelling revelation of privileged Government papers, it is respectfully submitted that the motion should be denied.

REPLY BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF MOTION BY DEFENDANT, THE PROCTER & GAMBLE COMPANY, FOR RETURN OF COPIES AND
OTHER WRITINGS—June 18, 1953

Without admitting any of the facts, inferences or conclusions set forth in the plaintiff's brief, defendant The Procter & Gamble Company (Procter) replies to certain features of such brief:

I

As to the plaintiff's retention of copies, notes and the like of papers produced by Procter before the Grand Jury, Judge Forman provided that the papers so produced should be retained in certain rooms in Newark. The plaintiff in 1951 requested Procter's consent to take the papers to [fol. 1822] Washington. Procter was unwilling but offered to take the matter up promptly with Judge Forman. Some time later Procter learned that without its consent or notice to it, and without any authority from Judge Forman, the plaintiff made copies, notes and the like, and took them to Washington, and has since refused to return them to Procter despite the termination of the Grand Jury proceedings seven months ago. This, as we contend, was improper and an abuse of process, and the copies, notes and the like should be returned to Procter.

II

As to the relevancy of the papers produced before the Grand Jury, the plaintiff has from time to time stated that at the "proper time" plaintiff will designate the papers on which it intends to rely at the trial. However, there has been no such designation nor any showing of relevance as to even a single paper.

The plaintiff did recently furnish Procter a list of Grand Jury papers to be photostated, under the Court's order of May 27, 1953, which list included the major part of all the document numbers produced by Procter before the Grand Jury, but even then stated that it was only an "initial [fol. 1823] listing". This list contained only the assigned numbers of the papers with no statement as to relevancy or as to plaintiff's reliance on the documents. For a period of two years—since the issuance of the Grand Jury subpoenas—Procter has been without any designation of the relevancy or proposed use of any paper or document in relation to any charge or allegation. We contend that Procter is entitled to the copies, notes and the like of its own papers for such aid as they may give on these questions of relevancy or future use in this case.

As to plaintiff's pleas of "confidential" and of "professional privacy", Procter denies the validity of these pleas.

The plaintiff cannot make its own rules for what it will and will not disclose, and this is true whether plaintiff acts through the Attorney General or anyone else. Certainly copies taken by plaintiff from Procter's own documents cannot violate any professional privacy. And it seems beyond doubt that notes and other data taken therefrom would in no manner invade the confidence or privacy of the plaintiff and its counsel.

[fols. 1824-1827] Conclusion

For the above reasons, as well as those previously stated in briefs, affidavits and arguments before the Court, the relief requested in Procter's motion should be granted.

Dated: June 18, 1953.

BRIEF OF THE UNITED STATES IN SUPPORT OF ITS MOTIONS FOR PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS UNDER RULE 34—September
23, 1954

The United States has moved under Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for orders directing each of the three manufacturing defendants in this case, Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Company, Lever Brothers Company, and The Procter & Gamble Company, (hereinafter referred to as "Colgate", "Lever", and "Procter"), to produce for inspection and copying certain designated documents. This brief is submitted in support of these three motions.

Nature of the Action

The complaint charges that beginning in 1926 the defendants have combined and conspired unreasonably to restrain and to monopolize trade and commerce in the production and sale of household soap and household synthetic detergents in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act (15 U.S.C., Secs. 1 and 2); and that Procter, Lever, and Colgate are now monopolizing, and for at least fifteen years prior to the filing of the complaint have continuously monopolized, the production and sale of these products in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act Par. 32). The complaint further charges that the combination and conspiracy among the defendants has consisted of a continuing concert of action the principal objectives of which have been to attain and exploit positions of dominance over all others, and to restrict and control competition with each other and with all others, in the production and sale of household soap and household synthetic detergents and in the purchase and sale of the principal raw materials used in them (Par. 33).

The scope and nature of these charges is indicated in the numerous specific allegations set forth in the complaint concerning concerted activities of Procter, Lever and Colgate in furtherance of their objectives (Par. 34). Pur-stant to the defendants' purpose to restrict and control competition and to attain and exploit positions of dominance in the household soap and household synthetic detergent industry, it is alleged that Procter, Lever and Colgate have employed the following means, among others:

- (1) exchanging information concerning prices, terms and conditions of sale, advertising and promotional methods, raw material purchases and prices, and other business details;
- (2) controlling and fixing the prices at which their household brands are sold by themselves and by retailers, and at which they purchase inedible tallow and grease;
- (3) making "confidential deals" in which prices paid for tallow and grease are concealed in order to avoid affecting published market prices or the market positions of other buyers and sellers;
- (4) controlling and regulating their use of advertising and promotional methods;
- (5) employing methods of couponing, special deals and other promotional devices designed to secure advantages for the defendants' brands in the allocation of retail shelf space and to obstruct the promotion and sale of household soap and synthetic detergents produced by other manufacturers;
- (6) sharing, by cross licenses to the exclusion of others, significant patents and patent rights;
- [fol. 1830] (7) purchasing and agreeing to purchase substantially all of the available supplies of base materials used in the production of synthetic detergents, and inducing principal producers of such base materials to concentrate upon the production of them for sale to Procter, Lever, and Colgate and to discontinue or curtail production of synthetic detergents; and
- (8) restricting and controlling competition in the production and sale of glycerine by curtailing production, fixing prices, and exchanging information.

Prior Developments in This Action

This action was instituted on December 11, 1952, following a comprehensive investigation of the household soap and household synthetic detergent industry. In March, 1953, plaintiff moved for an order under Rule 34 requiring Procter to produce for inspection and copying a number of documents and records previously produced pursuant to subpoenas issued by a grand jury. An order granting this motion was entered by the Court on May 27, 1953. Thereafter, on July 14, 1953, the Court entered stipulated orders requiring Lever and Colgate to produce for inspection and copying documents previously produced by them in the course of the grand jury investigation.

On June 4, 1954, Procter made two motions, one to require plaintiff to return all copies of its documents, together with all notes and other writings prepared from them; and the other, to suppress the use by plaintiff prior to or during trial of all documents submitted by Procter or any other person or firm to the grand jury, and all evidence, notes, etc., obtained from them. These motions were denied by the Court in orders entered on January 14, 1954.

Pursuant to requests by counsel for Procter, Colgate and Lever for reconsideration by the Department of Justice of the advisability of continuing this case against any or all of the defendants, the Assistant Attorney General in Charge of the Antitrust Division accorded counsel [fol. 1831] for each of the defendants individually an opportunity, on March 16, 17, 18 and 19, 1954, to present facts and arguments on its behalf. On July 16, 1954, he notified counsel for each of the defendants that, after careful consideration of the matters presented to him, he had concluded that the Government should proceed with the case.

Argument

I

The Documents Called For Are Necessary To Supplement Evidence Obtained Through Prior Investigation And Discovery

All of the documents sought by these three motions relate either to significant activities of the defendants during periods of time not included in the prior discovery, or to significant activities partially disclosed by information previously obtained.

Thus, Paragraphs 1, 3, 4 (except in the case of Procter), 5, 6, 7, 8 B), 8 C), 10, 12, 14, 15, 18 A), 20 and 23 of each motion call either entirely or in part for documents which bring substantially up to date documentary material previously called for or produced for earlier periods.

Paragraphs 5, 13, 14, 15 and 20 of each motion call either entirely or in part for documents which supplement documentary material previously called for or produced for other, limited periods of time.

Paragraphs 2, 4 (in the case of Procter only), 8 A), 8 D), 8 E), 8 F), 9, 11, 16, 17, 18 B), 19, 21, 22, 24 and 25 (Procter only—no similar request is included in the Colgate and Lever motions) of each motion call for documents the existence and relevancy of which is disclosed by documents or information previously obtained.

[fol. 1832] The practical necessity for plaintiff to obtain production of these documents in order to complete preparation of its case, and the fact that such production will facilitate the trial of this action, is sufficiently demonstrated, it is submitted, by the affidavit of Joseph E. McDowell, Trial Attorney of the Department of Justice, which was filed with each of these motions.

II

All Of The Documents Called For Are Relevant To Matters Involved In This Litigation

Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure authorizes the Court to compel the production of such material, not privileged, as constitutes or contains evidence relevant to the subject matter involved in the pending action. Michel v. Meier, 8 F.R.D. 464, 475 (W.D. Pa. 1948); Frasier v. Twentieth Century-Fox Film Corp., 119 F. Supp. 495, 498 D. Neb. 1954).

The courts have repeatedly said that Rule 34 must be liberally construed [See, for example, United States v. Procter & Gamble Co., 14 F.R.D. 230, 232 D. N.J. 1953)], particularly where the complaint alleges a conspiracy, as in this case. United States v. United States Alkali Export Association, Inc., 7 F.R.D. 256 (S.D.N.Y. 1946) at p. 259, and cases there cited. See also Quemos Theatre Co. Inc. v. Warner Bros. Pictures, Inc., 35 F. Supp. 949, 950 (D.C. N.J. 1940).

The documents designated in the motions now before the Court all relate to matters pleaded in the complaint and are there relevant to the subject matter involved in the pending litigation. Paragraphs 1, 2, 6 and 23 call for documents pertaining to profits, assets, size, sales or market position of each of the defendants, vis-a-vis one another and others in the industry. These documents relate primarily to the charges in the complaint involving dominance and monopolizing (Pars. 32, 33).

[fol. 1833] Paragraphs 3, 4, 5, 11 and 12 call for documents relating to each of the defendants' and other manufacturers' prices (on both factory and retail levels), price changes, and costs. These documents are principally related to the charges regarding monopolizing and restriction and control of competition (Pars. 32, 34 A)).

Paragraphs 7, 8 A) and 8 B) call for documents relating to patents, patent licenses and agreements, and patent litigation. The documents in this group relate most directly to matters involved in the charges regarding monopolizing and restriction and control of competition (Pars. 32, 34 A)).

Paragraphs 8 C), 8 D), 8 E), 8 F), 9 and 10 call for documents relating to the procurement, processing and production of finished synthetic detergents and synthetic detergent base materials. These documents relate principally to matters involved in the charges concerning monopolizing the production and sale of household synthetic detergents (Pars. 32, 34 A), 34 B)).

Paragraphs 13, 14, 15 and 16 call for documents concerning purchases and prices of tallow and grease, primary raw materials used in the production of soap. These documents relate primarily to the charges regarding the restraint and control of competition by the defendants in the purchase and sale of these materials (Pars. 32, 34 B)).

Paragraphs 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22 and 24 call for documents pertaining to advertising and promotional expenditures and campaigns. These documents relate most directly to matters involved in the charges regarding the combination and conspiracy to monopolize, and the attainment and exploitation of dominant market power (Pars. 32, 34 A)).

Finally, Paragraph 25 of the motion addressed to Procter calls for documents from that defendant relating to a proposed acquisition. These documents relate primarily to the charges concerning the attainment and maintenance [fol. 1834] of dominant power (Pars. 33, 34 A).

It should be noted that all of the documents called for by these motions are of the same type and character as were ordered produced before the grand jury by Judge Forman of this Court. Moreover, the affidavit of Joseph E. McDowell, referred to supra, p. 5, testifies to their relevance and bearing on the matters involved in this litigation.

It is submitted that this Court, on plaintiff's previous motion under Rule 34, determined for these reasons that documents of the same nature here called for are relevant within the meaning of Rule 34. This Court stated in its opinion:

The Government's attorney filed a statement under oath that the exhibits " . . . are relevant or material to the issues of this cause and are needed to aid the plaintiff in the preparation of its case" The fact that Judge Forman felt after extended hearings that the same documents were pertinent to the Government's case in the criminal proceedings lends strong support to plaintiff's statement. United States v. Procter & Gamble Co., supra, at p. 233.

III

The Documents Called For Are Designated With Sufficient Particularity

The designation of the documents called for in the manner employed in these motions, i.e., by categories relating to specific topics, has been approved by the Supreme Court in the case of grand jury subpoenas duces tecum. Brown v. United States, 276 U.S. 134 (1928); Consolidated Rendering v. Vermont, 207 U.S. 541 (1908). The word "designated" in Rule 34 was construed by the Advisory Committee on Rules for Civil Procedure as covering the manner of designation referred to in these decisions and followed in these motions. Report of the Advisory Committee on Rules for Civil Procedure (1947), p. 97.

The district courts have repeatedly followed the construction emphasized by the Advisory Committee in passing [fol. 1835] upon the adequacy of designation in Rule 34 demands.

United States v. United States Alkali Export Association, Inc., supra, p. 5

United States v. North Coast Transportation Co., 8 F.R.D. 62 (W.D. Wash. 1947)

United States v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., 76 F. Supp. 315 (D. Mass. 1948)

Hawaiian Airlines, Ltd. v. Trans-Pacific Airlines, Ltd., 8 F.R.D. 449 (D. Hawaii 1949)

In the Alkali Export Association case, the court ordered discovery of documents relating to "the negotiation, execution, operation or interpretation" of contracts. That case was followed by Judge Wyzanski in the United Shoe Machinery case in upholding a category type of designation as being in the interest of expediting the trial and achieving justice.

IV

Good Cause Has Been Shown By The Plaintiff For Requesting Production Of The Designated Documents.

The United States has stated supra, pp. 4-5, the reasons why the documents sought by these motions should be ordered produced. In addition, the relevance of the documents sought to the matters involved in this litigation has been shown, pp. 5-7. Although there is no clear definition of what constitutes "good cause" within the meaning of the Rule, the relevancy and materiality of the matter sought is an important element in the determination of whether there exists good cause. Wild v. Payson, 7 F.R.D. 495, 499 (S.D.N.Y. 1946).

Particularly in cases such as this, where plaintiff must rely on documents in the possession of the defendants to help it prove its case, it has been held that good cause is shown if the documents called for are relevant. See Caplin v. United Feature Syndicate, Inc., 8 F.R.D. 424, 425 [fols. 1836-1837] (S.D.N.Y. 1948) where the Court stated:

"Since the plaintiff must establish, if he can, his alleged claims by documents, most of which are in the possession of the defendants, he has shown the required "good cause" for the production and inspection of all documents under the defendants' control which constitute or contain any evidence relative to the subject matter involved, whether or not they will be admissible at the trial, if the same appear to be reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence.

The necessity for the documents sought is also a prime consideration in determining whether good cause has been shown; but above all, the liberal objectives of the Rule should be the touchstone. See Gordon v. Pennsylvania Railroad Co., 5 F.R.D. 510 (E.D. Pa. 1946), where Judge Kalodner remarked:

What constitutes good cause is a difficult question. The elements are suggested in 2 Moore's Federal Practice, Section 34.04. A liberal construction is, of course, desirable. United States v. Doudera, D.C.E.-D.N.Y. 1939, 28 F. Supp. 223. Considerations of practical convenience are of importance. So also, the Court should be satisfied that production of the requested document is necessary to enable a party to prepare his case, or will facilitate proof or progress at the trial. These must be the considerations, at least, given prominence by the Court. In the long run, whether the order to produce a particular document will be granted is a matter for the exercise of the Court's discretion, and the attempted statement of the rule results only in diminishing the desired flexibility of the Civil Rules. See 2 Moore's Federal Practice, Section 26.12 (as amended in the 1945 Cumulative Supplement, and see note 15 therein). It is sufficient guidance to keep in mind the liberal objectives of the Civil Rules.

CONCLUSION

It is respectfully submitted that for all of the reasons given above this Court should exercise its discretion in favor of granting these motion.

THE DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY

[Title omitted]

AFFIDAVIT—October 4, 1954

STATE OF NEW YORK, County of New York, ss:

WILLIAM L. MCGOVERN, being duly sworn, deposes and states:

1. I am an attorney for Lever Brothers Company, a defendant in the above-entitled action. I have been associated with this case since its inception, and I am personally familiar with all aspects of the matter since the initiation in May 1951 of the grand jury proceedings which preceded the complaint in this action.

2. This affidavit is made in behalf of Lever Brothers Company in opposition to a motion by Plaintiff dated August 20, 1954, as amended by notice dated September 23, 1954, for an order requiring Lever Brothers to produce for inspection and copying certain books, records and documents.

3. This is the fifth demand for documents which Plaintiff has made of Defendant. Documents have heretofore been produced by Lever Brothers under the following circumstances:

[fol. 1890] (a) A grand jury subpoena, returnable May 29, 1951, was served upon Lever Brothers, calling for a host of documents and records covering the period 1924 to April 30, 1951. Upon motion to quash seasonably made, this subpoena was sustained in part and quashed in part by Judge Forman. Under the subpoena, as thus modified, a substantial volume of records and books were turned over or made available for inspection to representatives of the Antitrust Division acting as agents for the grand jury.

(b) A grand jury subpoena, returnable June 19, 1951, was served upon Lever Brothers demanding a staggering volume of books, records and documents and embracing 80 percent of the more than 23,000 file drawers in the company's offices, archives and warehouses. After lengthy and careful consideration of this subpoena, Judge Forman drastically reduced the burden and scope of the demands. He quashed some of the Government demands outright; other demands were sharply limited as to time and type of document; and still others were quashed without prejudice to the right of Plaintiff to renew its demand upon a proper showing. Even as thus severely curtailed, Lever Brothers produced some 30 file drawers comprising approximately 150,000 documents.

(c) A grand jury subpoena, returnable June 9, 1952, was served upon Lever Brothers. This subpoena had the purpose and effect of updating the subpoenas described in (a) and (b) above and called for a further substantial volume of books and records for the year 1951. After a motion to quash was seasonably made by Lever Brothers, a consent order was entered on June 16, 1952, fixing the time and mode of compliance with this subpoena, and a substantial additional volume of books, records and documents was turned over to the Government.

[fol. 1891] The originals of a vast number of documents called for by the three subpoenas described above were so essential to the current conduct of the company's business, that photostatic copies were prepared by Lever Brothers at a substantial expenditure of time and money.

The grand jury before whom the aforesaid documents were produced was discharged without any indictment having been returned. Plaintiff thereupon filed the complaint in this action on December 11, 1952, and thereafter returned to Lever Brothers Company the documents previously turned over to it pursuant to the grand jury subpoenas described above.

(d) Plaintiff desired to use the documents previously produced by Lever Brothers in response to the grand jury subpoenas as though they had been produced pursuant to motion and order under Rule 34, F.R.C.P. Lever Brothers, in turn, desired access to documentary material which the Government had obtained during the course of the grand jury proceedings from parties other than the defendants in this case ("third persons"). In lieu of discovery and cross discovery proceedings under Rule 34, which would unnecessarily have burdened the Court, counsel for Lever Brothers Company and counsel for the Plaintiff agreed upon the following procedure:

(i) Lever Brothers agreed to return to the Plaintiff for inspection and copying such of those documents previously produced under grand jury subpoenas as the Plaintiff might from time to time designate;

(ii) Plaintiff agreed to make available to Lever Brothers a list of all third persons whose documents had been or still were in possession of Plaintiff and [fol. 1892] to make available for inspection and copying the documents of such third persons as agreed to such inspection and copying by Lever Brothers Company, without prejudice to the right of Lever Brothers to move this Court for an order requiring the Plaintiff to produce the documents of all such third persons for inspection and copying, irrespective of consent of such third persons; and

(iii) the Government agreed to supply Lever Brothers from time to time a designation of the documents on which it proposes to rely at the trial of this case.

4. These arrangements resulted in two orders of this Court dated July 14, 1953 and July 15, 1953. Although the understandings embodied in the orders of July 14 and July 15, 1953 were negotiated with Walker Smith, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, who preceded Mr. McDowell in this case, they have been observed by Lever Brothers with the utmost good faith, and during the previous five or six months since Mr. McDowell has been in charge of the case, Lever Brothers has been diligent in examining the documents made available to it by the Government and in making available to the Government such of its documents as the Government requested from time to time.

5. Pursuant to this discovery arrangement and on May 15, 1953, Assistant Attorney General Barnes furnished Lever Brothers with the names of seventy-two (72) third persons from whom the Government had obtained documentary material (Exhibit A attached hereto). Plaintiff thereafter undertook to communicate with each of these third persons to ascertain whether they would consent to an examination by defendants. On June 23, 1953, the [fol. 1893] Plaintiff advised Lever Brothers that thirty-three (33) companies had stated that they had no objection to an examination of their documents by counsel for the Defendants.

6. Several additional firms subsequently consented to the examination. A substantial number of such third persons demanded the Plaintiff return their documents and refused to consent to inspection by counsel for the Defendants. Defendants have continuously sought permission from such companies to ~~examine~~ their files in lieu of proceedings under Rule 34 to ~~compel~~ production of such files. Such negotiations are still in progress with such companies.

7. Counsel for Lever Brothers, jointly with counsel for the other Defendants, have been continuously engaged in diligently examining the documents of the third persons who consented to such examination. This examination has thus far entailed consideration of hundreds of thousands of documents turned over to the United States by third persons such as Armour & Co., Swift & Co., Wilson & Co., Allied Chemical and Dye Corporation, Standard Oil of California, Continental Oil Company, and Monsanto Chemical Corporation. Because the documents of many third persons were returned by the United States to the companies which furnished them, counsel for Defendants have been required to travel to various points throughout the United States in order to complete the examination of such documents. For this reason, as well as for the tremendous volume of documents involved, the cross discovery of the third persons who consented to the examination of their documents is not yet completed, and the cross discovery of third persons who withheld their consent has not yet begun. It is, therefore, presently impossible to estimate how many additional tens of thousands of documents remain to be examined.

[fol. 1894] 8. During the same period and pursuant to the order of July 14, 1953, Lever Brothers transmitted voluminous files aggregating approximately 30,000 documents to the Plaintiff on August 3, 1953. Additional files were transmitted to the Plaintiff on March 8, 1954. From time to time Plaintiff has returned to Lever Brothers various documents. Such a return was made on September 15, 1953, October 29, 1953, and November 12, 1953.

9. On July 9, 1954, the Plaintiff asked Lever Brothers by letter to deliver for further examination certain files, heretofore delivered to Plaintiff and returned to the Defendant. Plaintiff also asked that Lever Brothers furnish various additional files which Lever Brothers had agreed to hold for examination pursuant to the order of July 14, 1953. In response to this demand, twenty-three files containing approximately 100,000 documents were furnished to Plaintiff in July of this year and only a few days ago, on September 28, 1954, an additional 10,000 to 15,000 documents were furnished to Plaintiff by this Defendant. Defendant Lever Brothers has not been informed that additional such demands will not be made in the near future.

In sum, pursuant to the order of July 14, 1953, Lever Brothers transmitted to the Plaintiff between 45,000 and 50,000 documents, including about 20,000 furnished since July 9th of this year.

10. Upon information and belief, counsel for the Government have not yet completed the examination and analysis of the thousands of documents delivered by Defendant Lever Brothers in July 1954 and a few days ago on September 28, 1954. Plaintiff undertook to return these documents to this Defendant when it had completed its examination but it has not yet done so.

[fol. 1895] 11. Plaintiff has not yet designated which of these documents it intends to use, although it undertook to do so in the discovery agreement which resulted in the orders of July 14, 1953 and July 15, 1953. As the foregoing shows, the Government now has obtained copies of more than 30,000 documents of Lever Brothers alone and is presently examining an additional 20,000-25,000 of which they may retain a substantial number. Taken in conjunction with the documents previously obtained by the Plaintiff from other Defendants and third parties, the Plaintiff has presently in its possession hundreds of thousands of papers.

12. The fifth demand embodied in the present motion calls for the production of additional masses of documentary material. The pending motion for discovery will require Lever Brothers to produce for inspection and copying approximately 200,000 documents. If any substantial number of these documents are copied by Plaintiff, the Plaintiff will have in its possession copies of approximately 75,000 documents of Lever Brothers alone. This number must necessarily be augmented by additional tens of thousands of documents obtained from the other Defendants—and this before the Plaintiff or the Defendants have completed examining and digesting the documentary mass presently available to them.

13. As the foregoing shows, the discovery and cross discovery contemplated by the orders of July 14, 1953 and July 15, 1953 are still being carried forward diligently, and none of the parties has completed the exchange or analysis of the documents covered by those orders. However, if the instant motion is granted, the entire attention of counsel must be diverted to a further search of the files [fol. 1896] and a selection of the masses of documents called for by the motion. Consequently, the grant of this motion at this time can only disrupt the orderly schedule of the pending discovery, delay for months the completion of analysis of the documents already exchanged, and forestall an early designation by the Government of the documents on which it intends to rely, so essential to an orderly and expeditious trial of this case.

William L. McGovern.

REPLY AND SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEF ON BEHALF OF THE PROCTER & GAMBEE COMPANY IN SUPPORT OF ITS MOTION FOR AN ORDER DIRECTING DISCLOSURE OF GRAND JURY TRANSCRIPTS.
—November 28, 1955

I. Contrary to Plaintiff's Contention, the Authorities support the proposition that access should be granted to the Grand Jury Transcripts under the circumstances of this case.

A court, in its discretion, and in the interests of justice, may require disclosure of the transcripts of Grand Jury testimony. The doctrine has long been recognized, and is well known to this Court. United States v. White, D.N.J., [fol. 2050] 104 F. Supp. 120; U. S. v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150, 233-4; United States v. Rose, 3 Cir., 215 F. 2d 617; United States v. Alper, 2 Cir., 156 F. 2d 222; United States v. Byoir, N. D. Tex., 58 F. Supp. 273, aff'd 5 Cir., 147 F. 2d 336; Atwell v. United States, 4 Cir., 162 Fed. 97; In re Grand Jury Proceedings, E. D. Pa., 4 F. Supp. 283; In re Bullock, D.C.D.C., 103 F. Supp. 639; United States v. Farrington, N.D.N.Y., 5 Fed. 343; Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, Rule 6 (e); see also Herzog v. United States, 75 S. Ct. 349.

The vast majority of the cases relied on by plaintiff in support of a contrary rule (P's Brief, p. 3-4) are easily distinguishable as criminal cases in which an accused seeks to secure access to the Grand Jury minutes for the purpose of quashing the indictment on the ground that no competent evidence of guilt was presented to the Grand Jury. The judicial caution exercised in denying access in cases of this character is perhaps justified. If disclosure of Grand Jury transcripts were freely permitted under such circumstances, every accused would, in effect, have an appeal from the indictment.

Criminal cases of the type cited by plaintiff involve none of the circumstances discussed in Procter's motion [fol. 2051] and original brief which justify disclosure of the Grand Jury testimony in this case and may, we submit, be disregarded.*

United States v. General Motors Corp., D. Del., 15 F.R.D. 486, also relied on by plaintiff (P's Brief, p. 5-6), is fully discussed in the brief of other defense counsel. We merely add that it does not appear from the General Motors opinion that, as plaintiff admits in this case and this Court found (Procter's original brief, p. 3), the Grand Jury proceedings had been used by plaintiff to determine what action should be taken to enforce the antitrust laws "through criminal proceedings, civil proceedings or both" (opinion filed May 11, 1953, p. 4-5, 14 F.R.D. 230, 233; plaintiff's Aff. of March 21, 1953, p. 1). Nor does it appear from the General Motors opinion that, as in the soap case, the Delaware court had, by order, nevertheless permitted the plaintiff to utilize in the civil proceeding papers and information obtained during the course of the [fol. 2052] Grand Jury proceeding (orders of January 14, 1955 in this case).

United States v. Henry S. Morgan, et al., Civil Action No. 43-757, S.D.N.Y., Oct. 30, 1947, also relied on by the plaintiff (P's Brief, p. 5), has been thoroughly dealt with in the brief of other defense counsel. To avoid undue repetition, suffice it to say that the court in that case admittedly was influenced by Judge Hand's remark of thirty years ago in United States v. Garsson, S.D.N.Y., 291 Fed. 646, 649, that "no judge of this court has granted it [inspection of Grand Jury minutes], and I hope none ever will." Judge Hand, of course, was speaking in the context of a criminal case in which the defendant was seeking to quash

* Indeed, in many of such cases, the courts concede that the Grand Jury minutes would be opened upon a sufficient showing of cause. United States v. Perlman, S.D.N.Y., 247 Fed. 158; United States v. Silverthorne, W.D.N.Y., 265 Fed. 853; United States v. Ludecker, W.D.N.Y., 275 Fed. 976; United States v. Olen, E.D.N.Y., 21 F. Supp. 281; United States v. Papaioannu, D. Del. 10 F.R.D. 517.

 Plaintiff's comment (Brief, p. 4) that this Court has twice rejected Procter's assertion that plaintiff used the Grand Jury process to investigate and prepare this civil action is, therefore, plainly erroneous.

the indictment. There is no evidence in the Garsson opinion that he was concerned with Grand Jury secrecy, as such. He was rather concerned with matters of criminal procedure and it seems doubtful that he intended his remark to be relied upon in other contexts. Moreover, the Southern District of New York admittedly had, at least at that time, a severe rule in such cases. United States v. Morse, S.D.N.Y., 292 Fed. 273. Later opinions in the Second Circuit, in which Judge Hand joined, indicate that the rule has been relaxed, or does not apply, at least where there is no [fol. 2053] attempt to review an indictment. United States v. Alper, 2 Cir., 156 F. 2d 222; United States v. Remington, 2 Cir., 191 F. 2d 246. In the Morgan case, however, the somewhat casual presentation of the defendants' application did not suffice to shake the court's convictions based on Judge Hand's remark.

We submit, therefore, that neither General Motors nor Morgan require a denial of access to the Grand Jury transcripts in this case. Each case, including our own, should be viewed in its own setting and tested under the settled rule that the Court may order disclosure of the Grand Jury testimony where the interests of justice require. We submit, as more fully developed in Procter's motion and brief of September 24, 1954, that the ends of justice require that all of the transcripts of the Grand Jury testimony be made available to Procter in this case.

II. The recent deposition of Mr. Siddall emphasizes an additional reason for granting access to the grand jury testimony.

During plaintiff's deposition of Procter's witness, Siddall, questions were asked by plaintiff concerning matters which Siddall recalled were testified to by him before the Grand Jury. Procter objected to such questions on the [fol. 2054] Grand Jury ground. Moreover, the problem presented by such questions may well arise in future proceedings in this case.

As to such questions, and as to any Grand Jury witness who may later be examined in this civil action, it is apparent that the witness, good though his memory may be, cannot be expected to recall in detail the precise tenor of voluminous Grand Jury testimony given three years ago or more. Moreover, conditions may have changed since the time of his Grand Jury testimony. Yet, unless Procter has access to the Grand Jury transcripts, plaintiff, which has had the transcripts available to it for years, may well charge various witnesses with inconsistent statements, apparent or even real, thus involving the witness in the disadvantage of making explanations of an honest mistake or a lapse of memory or a change of conditions. Plaintiff may, if the witness's present testimony is favorable to it, remain silent. It may, if his present recollection is unfavorable to plaintiff, attempt to impeach him.

We do not believe that the spirit or purpose of the Federal Rules condone such an inequity which places the plaintiff in a "head I win, tails you lose" position. For this reason and for the reasons stated in Procter's motion [fol. 2055] and supporting papers, we submit that the gross injustice of the preferred status now enjoyed by plaintiff should be removed by granting disclosure to Procter of the Grand Jury transcripts.

III. Procter is entitled to access to the transcripts of the grand jury testimony of all witnesses who consent to such disclosure.

In recent years, increasing recognition has been accorded the need for a solution, particularly in antitrust cases, of the problem of equalizing the inequities inherent in the situation where the Government can utilize the Grand Jury process to prepare civil cases, while the defendants are denied access to Grand Jury materials (see, e.g., Report of Attorney General's National Committee to Study the Antitrust Laws [1955] 345). As will be observed hereinafter, recognition of the problem has been accompanied by judicial efforts to afford relief to defendants seeking to remove at least some of the unfair advantages of the Government. This case, where the inequities are so striking, offers, we submit, an opportunity for a clear-cut solution of the problem—a solution which is entirely in accord with law and principle but which nevertheless has need of a convincing enunciation.

Procter contends that it is entitled to all of the Grand [fol. 2056] Jury testimony. It nevertheless points out that additional authority establishes beyond doubt that access should be granted at least to the Grand Jury testimony of those witnesses who consent to the disclosure. United States v. Standard Oil of California, et al., No. 11584-C, S.D. Calif., Central Div., Pre-trial Memorandum No. 1 filed July 6, 1955; United States v. Rose, 3 Cir., 215 F. 2d 617, 630; In re Bullock, D.C.D.C., 103 F. Supp. 639; VIII Wigmore on Evidence (3d ed.) 724.

The general principle is stated in VIII Wigmore on Evidence (3d ed.) 724, where it is said:

"The theory of the privilege is that the witness is guaranteed against compulsory disclosure; the privilege must therefore be that of the witness, and rests upon his consent." (Emphasis the author's.)

The principle was alluded to in In re Bullock, D.C.D.C., 103 F. Supp. 639, where Judge Kirkland, pursuant to his discretionary power under Criminal Rule 6 (e), granted access to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of the Grand Jury testimony of a non-consenting witness. [fol. 2057] That the court was aware of the decisive effect of consent to disclosure is demonstrated by its prefatory statement to the effect that (p. 641):

"Since the respondent declined voluntarily to consent to the disclosure of the Grand Jury minutes, this opinion will be concerned with the Court's power under the first part of Criminal Rule 6 (e)."

This Circuit, in the recent case of United States v. Rose, 3 Cir., 215 F. 2d 617, has recognized that consent of the

* Parenthetically, we might note that plaintiff, in its discussion in the Bullock case (Brief, p. 8), apparently continues to assume that the Government, as a litigant, is in some privileged or superior position. Thus, plaintiff says that the Bullock case was one "where the public interest in disclosure, as opposed to the wishes of a private litigant, was determined to be paramount to the policy of secrecy." Presumably plaintiff would have it inferred that the "wishes of a private litigant" can never be a matter of "public interest". No argument, of course, is needed to show that the Government should be in no better position in this case than a private party and should be held to the same standards of fairness.

witness to disclosure of his testimony removes any obstacle to the granting of access. Although the case involved alleged perjury before the Grand Jury, Judge Kalodner, after referring to the reasons traditionally given for preserving secrecy, went on to assert (p. 630):

"Since all the defendant desires is a transcript of his own testimony, the sanctity of that which transpired before the Grand Jury is hardly in question. In addition, such disclosure would not subvert any of the reasons traditionally given for the inviolability of Grand Jury proceedings." (Emphasis the court's.)

[fol. 2058] None of the five traditional reasons for Grand Jury secrecy referred to by Judge Kalodner are applicable where, as in this case, the Grand Jury was discharged over three years ago without returning an indictment against any of the present defendants and where, as here, the plaintiff itself publicized the fact of the Grand Jury investigation. Any policy in favor of encouraging free disclosures by persons having information with respect to the commission of crimes can refer, at most, to a temporary secrecy. As Professor Wigmore says (VIII Wigmore on Evidence [3d ed.] 724-5):

"But obviously, the secrecy that is guaranteed is only temporary and provisional. Permanent secrecy would be more than is necessary to render the witness willing. Moreover, it would go too far by creating an opportunity for abuse; since a corrupt witness would be able to utilize it for perjured charges.

"But what are the limits of this temporary secrecy? The answer is, on principle, that it ceases when the grand jury has finished its duties and has either indicted or discharged the persons accused." (Emphasis the author's.)

Clearly, this must be so. The Grand Jury witness himself is under no obligation of secrecy, his deposition may be taken in the civil case by the defendants, he may be [fol. 2059] called to testify at the trial. Under these circumstances why, after discharge of the Grand Jury, should a record of what he said be obscured in secrecy? A policy to that end would do no more than encourage perjury. In addition, if the witness consents to disclosure, there can be, as Judge Kalodner says, no reason whatsoever to suppress his testimony.

The Rose decision also casts substantial doubt on the validity of United States v. General Motors Corp. D. Del., 15 F.R.D. 486, supra. Moreover, neither General Motors nor Morgan can apply with respect to witnesses who consent to disclosure of their Grand Jury testimony.

The rule of the Third Circuit was, within the past few months, applied in the District of California. In United States v. Standard Oil of California et al., No. 11584-C, S. D. Calif., Central Div., the defendants filed interrogatories asking, among other things, for identification of Grand Jury witnesses. The purpose of the interrogatories was preparation for a subsequent motion to produce the transcripts. Judge James M. Carter dealt with the problem as though an application had actually been made for [fol. 2060] the transcripts and, in this regard, stated (Pre-trial Memorandum No. 1, filed July 6, 1955, p. 2-3):

"There are valid reasons why grand jury transcripts should not be made public. The citizen should be permitted to testify without fear that his testimony will be made public. This objective is served if the witness is given the right to determine if his testimony shall be thereafter made public. No bars however can come in this case, from supplying the defendants with the names of those testifying before the grand jury.

"The court proposes:—

"1. That the plaintiff supply the name and identification of all witnesses appearing before the 1947-1948 grand jury, except 'informers' as hereafter discussed. The 'in camera' report shows a total of 42 witnesses; 17 were then officers or employees of defendants, and supply the name and identification of each witness appearing before the 1939 grand jury, which plaintiff proposes to use at the trial of the action. The 'in camera" report shows 7 of such witnesses at the 1939 session.

"2. That if the written consent of a witness be obtained, a copy of the transcript of such witness's testimony be supplied the defendants. If such witness consents, then obviously there is no informer privilege to be protected. This would probably make available all the transcripts of the executives and officers of defendant corporations.

"The consent of each witness should only be obtained by addressing a letter to him, asking for consent, and enclosing a form on which the consent may be entered [fol. 2061] dorsed. The letter and form of consent should be approved by the court.

"The defendants should undertake the obtaining of the consents."

In its Answer of November 8, 1955, to Procter's motion objecting to the taking of Mrs. Siddall's deposition, plaintiff asserts in effect (p. 10-11) that even though Judge Carter stated that the Grand Jury testimony of consenting witnesses should be supplied to the defendant, the Government has not acquiesced. We do not see that plaintiff's remark calls for an answer.

To implement his ruling, Judge Carter stated (p. 3) that the Government should submit to the court, in camera, the names of the Grand Jury witnesses whom the Government considered to be "informers" who were not to be called as witnesses at the trial, together with the reasons why they should be considered informers. Apparently, Judge Carter was prepared to confine "informers" to one who "voluntarily" supplied information "under an assurance, expressed or at least implied, that his identity is not to be revealed." (p. 6)

"If this Court should determine upon a similar program, [fol. 2062] and if plaintiff should assert an informer's privilege as to any of the Grand Jury witnesses, Procter respectfully requests an opportunity to be heard for the purpose of establishing that none of such witnesses may properly be classified as informers, as well as for any other purposes which may be pertinent.

The cases above discussed plainly establish that Procter is entitled, at the very least, to have access to the transcripts of the Grand Jury testimony of those witnesses who consent to disclosure. It is anticipated that consents can readily be obtained from most, if not all, of the Grand Jury witnesses. Procter offers to join in any program designed by the Court to accomplish the obtaining of such consents.

Conclusion

Preferably, this Court should order plaintiff to make available to Procter for inspection and copying the transcripts of the testimony of all Grand Jury witnesses. At the least, we submit that the Court should order plaintiff to identify all Grand Jury witnesses and, as to consenting witnesses, order plaintiff to make available to Procter for [fol. 2063-2064] inspection and copying the transcripts of their testimony. In the event the latter course is pursued, it is suggested that a decision on the motion for access to all Grand Jury testimony be deferred until it is determined to what extent the witnesses have consented.

DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY

BRIEF OF LEVER BROTHERS COMPANY IN SUPPORT OF ITS MOTION TO INSPECT AND COPY TESTIMONY OF WITNESSES
BEFORE THE GRAND JURY—November 28, 1955

INTRODUCTION

Prior to the institution of the present civil proceedings by the United States, the Government conducted a prolonged grand jury investigation extending over a period of 18 months from May 1951 until November 1952. The term of the grand jury expired without indictment and the instant civil suit was filed on December 11, 1952.

In the spring of 1953, the defendants requested the Government to make available to them all documents obtained by the Government from various third parties pursuant to grand jury process. The defendants predicated this demand upon the terms of Rules 16 and 17 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure as interpreted by the Supreme Court in Bowman Dairy Co. v. United States, 341 U.S. 315, 71 S. Ct. 676. This case holds that in the new Rules of Criminal Procedure "there was no [fol. 2066] intention to exclude from the reach of process of the defendant any material that had been used before the grand jury or could be used at the trial". (Emphasis added). In recognition of this principle, the Government consented to the entry of an order of this court dated June 15, 1953, which permitted the defendants to inspect and copy documents or copies of documents which the United States had obtained by grand jury process from 37 persons, firms or corporations, who, upon request, had consented to the inspection of their documents by the defendants.¹

On October 17, Lever Brothers wrote the Assistant Attorney General, Stanley M. Barnes, of its need in the preparation of its case of access to the transcript of testimony of witnesses appearing before the grand jury, and suggested that the same policy be adopted with respect to the testimony of such witnesses as had been adopted in July of 1953 with respect to the documents produced before the grand jury by such witnesses, namely, that Lever be given access to the grand jury testimony of witnesses who consented thereto.

On November 2, the Assistant Attorney General informed counsel for Lever Brothers that the Government did not regard the action of this court of July 16, 1953, respecting the disclosure of documents produced before the grand jury, as any precedent for disclosure of the [fol. 2067] testimony of witnesses appearing before that body. He declined to consent to the disclosure of the grand jury testimony of the witnesses.

Accordingly, Lever Brothers Company has filed a motion in this court to permit the inspection and copying of those portions of the grand jury transcript which set forth the testimony of witnesses appearing before the grand jury, or, in the alternative, for such portions of the transcript as set forth the testimony of such witnesses as consent to the disclosure of their grand jury testimony. The grounds for this motion are: (1) that no privilege of secrecy attaches to the testimony of a witness before the grand jury; (2) that Lever Brothers is urgently in need of access to such testimony in order to discover in this civil proceeding the evidentiary basis, if any, for the charges in the Government's complaint and to prepare its defenses to such charges; and (3) that if Lever Brothers seeks to obtain discovery of the witness' testimony through depositions pursuant to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, this process will necessarily involve substantial cost and severe inconvenience to all parties, will gravely retard the expeditious preparation of this cause for trial, and will not in any event produce accurate information as to the witnesses' testimony because of the lapse of time and other factors.

Summary of Argument

From the earliest times, the law has maintained a sharp distinction between the secrecy that attaches to the deliberation of the grand jurors and that which attaches to the testimony of witnesses. Indeed, it was the late [fol. 2068] Seventeenth Century before even the right of the grand jurors themselves to be secure in their deliberations was finally established. As to the witnesses before a grand jury, with sporadic exceptions, wherever the tradition of the common law has prevailed, it has been recognized that they have at best, only a temporary privilege against disclosure, existing until the grand jury has finished its proceedings. Even for the temporary period when it existed at all, the privilege was that of the witness, to be waived in his sole discretion. This distinction between the secrecy surrounding the deliberations of the grand jury and the limited privilege accorded witnesses appearing before it has now been codified in Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which forbids the imposition of an oath of secrecy on a witness.

By far the greater number of the cases involving the secrecy of grand jury proceedings have arisen in criminal matters where an attempt was being made to quash the indictment on the ground that sufficient evidence was not present to establish probable cause. In short, the question has ordinarily been engendered by an effort of an accused to cause the judge to substitute his judgment for that of the grand jury as to the existence of grounds for indictment. These efforts have uniformly met with rebuff. It was in this context that the oft-quoted remarks of Judge Learned Hand in the Garsson case were uttered, to repudiate once and for all the notion that a district judge should assume the functions of a grand jury.

An uncritical application of Judge Hand's remarks, so salutary in their own setting, to other and unrelated contexts, can result in considerable mischief. Indeed, in [fol. 2069] at least two recent cases, Judge Hand, himself, participated in rebuffs administered by the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to District Courts for refusing in proper cases to make available to defendants in criminal cases grand jury testimony. Thus, even in criminal cases and even as to the oath of secrecy of the grand juror, himself, the rule of secrecy has never been absolute. It has always been recognized that, as Mr. Justice Douglas observed in the Socony-Vacuum case, "After the grand jury functions are ended, disclosure is wholly proper where the ends of justice require it."

In the instant case, no attack is being made on the grand jury proceedings and no attempt to breach the limited secrecy that surrounds the deliberations of the grand jury is involved. Rather, access is here sought only to the testimony of witnesses and only in an effort to discover relevant facts in a subsequent civil proceeding. Here, the grand jury proceeding as such is not involved. The interest of the defendant is solely to obtain access to evidentiary material which is available to the plaintiff and to which the defendant is entitled within the letter and spirit of Rule 33 of the Rules of Civil Procedure. The fact that this material is in the form of witness' testimony before a grand jury rather than in depositions is due entirely to the plaintiff's choice of the grand jury as a discovery instrument.

Had the Government conducted its discovery in this case by deposition, the present problem would not have arisen. It is conceded by all that the defendants can now proceed to take the depositions of all witnesses before the grand jury and freely inquire into their testimony before [fol. 2070] that body. It follows that the objection now advanced by the Government to disclosing the witnesses' grand jury testimony is one of form and not of substance. In effect, the Government concedes that the witness on civil deposition may be asked to recall his grand jury testimony of three to four years ago. However, the Government contends that the witness' recollection may not be refreshed by the grand jury record of what he said over three to four years ago. But such an argument confuses the whole notion of privilege: if the witness, as distinct from a juror, has any privilege at all, that privilege must go to his testimony, not to the recordation of it. As Judge Hough, in a statement cited with approval by the Supreme Court in the Socony-Vacuum case, once observed for a Court of Appeals panel of which Judge Learned Hand was a member:

"The bald fact that the memory refreshing words are found in the records of a grand jury is not a valid objection."

Further, the present case presents to the Court only the extremely narrow question of access to such testimony in subsequent civil antitrust litigation where the Government has had prior resort to a grand jury for what, in effect, is civil discovery. Such cases are comparatively rare and present almost unique circumstances for the accommodation of the broad purposes of civil discovery to the limited policy of secrecy in criminal procedure. To hold that evidence in a civil antitrust case, taken in the form of grand jury testimony, shall be available for discovery under the civil rules involves none of the policy considerations which arise in a criminal proceeding. It is merely to hold that in a civil antitrust case both the Government and the defendants shall be governed by the same Rules [fol. 2071] of Civil Procedure. Fair play between the parties would seem to require no less.

In the circumstances here, then, no rule of law or logic militates against the disclosure of the witness' grand jury testimony. The alternative to such a practicable and expeditious discovery of the evidence in this civil proceeding is a prolonged series of depositions all over the country at untold expense in time and money to the court, the Government and the defendants. Such a result can only operate to defeat rather than serve "the ends of justice" by putting the parties to unnecessary expense and by unduly delaying the trial of this cause.

I. History of Grand Jury Oath of Secrecy Reflects Sharp Distinction Between Jurors and Witnesses.

There seems little doubt that at common law no obligation or oath of secrecy was ever imposed on witnesses before a grand jury. Indeed, in a day and age when grand and petite jurors alike were qualified by their knowledge rather than their ignorance of the facts, even the grand jurors, themselves, were not sworn to secrecy. Thus, in Bracton's time (c. 1258), the oath administered to grand jurors contained no undertaking of secrecy at all (Bracton De Legibus Angliae, Tugwell's Ed., pp. 239-241). By the time of Lambard, however, (c. 1571) it was the general practice to administer an oath of secrecy to grand jurors in substantially the modern form (Lambard Eirenarcha (1588) p. 397), although Wigmore cites the Earl of Shaftesbury's Trial, 8 How. St. Tr. 759, 771 (1681) as the last attempt by a court to require that grand jury proceedings be held in public. Wigmore, Evidence (3 Ed.) § 2360.

[fol. 2072] To witnesses, on the other hand, no oath of secrecy was ever administered at common law. The earliest form of the oaths administered to grand jurors and to witnesses, respectively, which have come down to us, are to be found in the Book of Oaths. They are (1688 Ed., pp. 113-115):

"The Oath of the Great Inquest"

"Ye shall truly enquire, and due presentment make of all such things as you are charged withall on the Queens behalf, the Queens Council, your own, and your fellows, you shall well and truly keep; and in all other things the truth present. So help you God, and by the Contents of this Book. (Emphasis supplied)

"The Oath of those that give Evidence Upon Bills of Indictment"

"The Evidence that you shall give to the Inquest, upon this Bill shall be the truth. And you shall not let so to do for malice, hatred or evil will, nor for meed, dread, favour or affection. So help you God, and the Holy Contents of this Book."

This striking difference between the oath taken by a juror, who was admonished to keep his own and his fellows' council—that is, to keep their deliberations confidential—and that taken by a witness who was under no injunction "to hold his tongue" clearly discloses that no obligation of secrecy was ever imposed upon witnesses. Subsequent cases extended the juror's obligation to secrecy to persons who assisted the grand jury in the administration of justice, such as the clerk and the prosecutor. Hale, Pleas of the Crown (1736), Vol. 2, p. 161. But no substantial English authority exists for the proposition that an oath of secrecy could ever be imposed on a witness. This distinction, recognized so clearly by the English common law, has become thoroughly established in the common law of a majority of the states in which the question has [fol. 2073] arisen. People v. Young, 31 Cal. 563 (1867); People v. Haughton, 38 How. Pr. 430 (1870); Little v. Comm., 66 Va. 921 (1874); Burns Detective Agency v. Holt, 138 Minn. 165, 164 N. W. 590 (1917); State v. Fish, 90 N. J.L. 17, 100 Atl. 181 (1917); State v. Borg, 150 Atl. 189 (N. J. 1930).

The same distinction has been recognized in the Federal Courts. United States v. Amazon Corp., 55 F. 2d 254, D. C. Md. (1931), and cases cited. As Judge Coleman observed in the latter case, after examining the history of the secrecy of grand jury proceedings in England and America, at p. 264:

"It is significant in this connection to note that witnesses before federal grand juries are not sworn to secrecy."

This historic distinction between the role of the grand juror and that of a witness before the grand jury has now been codified in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Rule 6(e), while imposing temporary and limited secrecy on the jurors, attorneys, and stenographer, specifically forbids the administration of an oath of secrecy to a witness by providing:

"No obligation of secrecy may be imposed upon any persons except in accordance with this rule."

The Advisory Committee's Note on Rule 6(e) states:

"2. The rule does not impose any obligation of secrecy on witnesses. The existing practice on this point varies among the districts. The seal of secrecy on witnesses seems an unnecessary hardship and may lead to injustice if a witness is not permitted to make a disclosure to counsel or to an associate."

See also Dession, The New Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure: II, 56 Yale L. J. 197, 203-204 (1947), giving same interpretation to Rule 6(e).

[fol. 2074] .II. Even the Grand Juror's Oath Imposes Only a Limited Obligation of Secrecy Which May Be Lifted Whenever the Interests of Justice Require.

The reasons for the limited rule of secrecy attaching to the Grand Jury's deliberation are set forth in the much-cited opinion of Judge Coleman in United States v. Amazon Corp., supra, recently given new currency in this Circuit in United States v. Rose, 215 F. 2d 617, 628 (C. A. 3, 1954), where the Court of Appeals required that a defendant accused of perjury be shown his grand jury testimony. The Court of Appeals restated the policy considerations underlying grand jury secrecy as:

“(1) To prevent the escape of those whose indictment may be contemplated; (2) to insure the utmost freedom to the grand jury in its deliberations, and to prevent persons subject to indictment or their friends from importuning the grand jurors; (3) to prevent subornation of perjury or tampering with the witnesses who may testify before the grand jury and later appear at the trial of those indicted by it; (4) to encourage free and untrammelled disclosures by persons who have information with respect to the commission of crimes; (5) to protect the innocent accused who is exonerated from disclosure of the fact that he has been under investigation, and from the expense of standing trial when there was no probability of guilt.”

While the deliberations of the grand jury have been protected down through the years by the grand juror's oath of secrecy, however, all courts have always recognized that even the grand juror's oath of secrecy could not be pressed to the point where it defeated the very ends of justice which it was meant to serve. Accordingly, it has been uniformly recognized that after the grand jury has performed its duties and the reason for the rule of secrecy has ceased, the rule itself becomes inoperative. Attorney [fol. 2075] General v. Pelletier, 240 Mass. 264, 134 N. E. 406 (1922).

One of the earliest statements of the rule governing disclosure of grand jury testimony in the federal courts is found in United States v. Farrington, 5 Fed. 343, 347 (D.C. N.D. N.Y. 1881), where District Judge Wallace said:

"The rule which may be adduced from the authorities, and which seems most consistent with the policy of the law, is that whenever it becomes essential to ascertain what has transpired before a grand jury it may be shown, no matter by whom; and the only limitation is that it may not be shown how the individual jurors voted or what they said during their investigations, (The People v. Shattuck, 6 Abb. N.C. 34; Commonwealth v. Mead, 12 Gray 167,) because this cannot serve any of the purposes of justice." (5 Fed. p. 347).

Atwell v. United States, 162 Fed. 97 (C.C.A. 4, 1908) also contains a well known statement on disclosure of grand jury proceedings. The court held that in a proper case even a juror could disclose the testimony of witnesses:

"The reason of the law is the life of the law, and this in a much stronger sense is true as to its policy. When once the reason for a policy to be pursued no longer exists, certainly the requirement to pursue that policy ends. It would not be required of grand jurors, we think, by any possible sound course of reasoning, after indictment found, trial and conviction had, judgment rendered, and penalty suffered, to refrain from ever discussing or mentioning to any one the testimony adduced on trial, solely because it had been first adduced before them in the grand jury room. * * * What reason, therefore, can exist why the grand jurors, under such conditions, should be bound to secrecy? We can see none; and for these reasons we hold this fourth obligation of the grand juror's oath to require secrecy only so long as the policy of the law requires, and that that policy does not require it, so far as the evidence adduced before the grand jury is concerned, after presentment and indictment found, made public, and custody of [fol. 2076] the accused had, and the grand jury finally discharged." 162 Fed. 99-100, 101.

In Metzler v. United States, 64 F. 2d 203 (C.A. 9, 1933) the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals also held that the secrecy which surrounds the grand jury's deliberation has but a temporary utility:

"Where the ends of justice can be furthered thereby and when the reasons for secrecy no longer exist the policy of the law requires that the veil of secrecy be raised." (64 F. 2d at 206).

The rule was given authoritative statement, with citation of the Metzler case, in United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U. S. 150, 60 S. Ct. 811, holding that grand jury testimony may properly be used to refresh witnesses' recollection. The Supreme Court said:

"... Grand jury testimony is ordinarily confidential. See Wigmore, supra, § 2362.

"But after the grand jury's functions are ended, disclosure is wholly proper where the ends of justice require it. See Metzler v. United States, 9 Cir. 64 F. 2d 203, 206. . . . 301 U. S. 233-234, 60 S. Ct. 849.

See also In Re Bullock, 103 F. Supp. 639 (D.C. D.C. 1952) and Herzog v. United States, 75 S. Ct. 349. In the Herzog case, Douglas, Circuit Justice, held that denying an accused's request to inspect a witness' testimony before a grand jury in order to impeach the witness raised a substantial question entitling a defendant to bail. To the same effect, see also In Re Grand Jury Proceedings, 4 F. Supp. 283, 284 (D.C. E.D. Pa., 1933).

The cases just cited teach that even a grand juror's oath of secrecy will be lifted where appropriate to serve the ends of justice. Such cases are, of course, to be distinguished from the host of cases² which hold that a District Court will not open a grand jury transcript in order to weigh whether the grand jury had probable cause to indict. The principle underlying cases of this type was tersely expressed in a much quoted statement of Judge Learned Hand in United States v. Garsson, 291 Fed. 647, 649 (D.C. S.D. N.Y. 1923). In that case Judge Hand, on a motion to quash, summarily repudiated the notion that a district judge could assume the function of a grand jury and undertake to determine from the evidence before that body whether probable cause existed.

Such a view is, of course, unexceptional, but that Judge Hand never expected his remarks in the context of a motion to quash to be uncritically applied to other circumstances is reflected by his own action in later cases. In United States v. Remington, 191 F. 2d 246, 250 (C.A. 2; 1951); cert. den., 343 U. S. 907, 72 S. Ct. 580 (1952), Judge Hand participated in a reversal of a conviction for perjury where the defendant was denied the right to inspect his grand jury testimony. Similarly, in United States v. Alper, 156 F. 2d 222 (C.A. 2, 1946), Judge Hand was a member of a panel which, in the course of reversing the District Court on other grounds, admonished the lower court to give careful consideration to the defendant's right to inspect grand jury testimony of witnesses for the purpose of impeaching them at his second trial.

[fol. 2078] III. Unlike Grand Juror, Witness Has Only Temporary Privilege of Secrecy and He May Waive It At Any Time.

While no oath of secrecy may be imposed upon a witness, he has traditionally been clothed with a temporary privilege of secrecy. The justification for such secrecy rests primarily upon the necessity for inducing witnesses to testify freely.

A. Witness Privilege Temporary

Wigmore explains that a witness' privilege is temporary and provisional. Wigmore, Evidence, (3rd Ed.) § 2360 and § 2361. It ends (1) when an indictment is returned on the witness' testimony or (2) when an indictment is not returned. Wigmore explains this proposition as follows (§ 2362):

"The witnesses and the complainants appearing before the grand jury must be guaranteed temporarily against compulsory disclosure of their testimony and complaints, because otherwise the State could not expect to secure ample quantity of evidence for the information of the grand jury. . . .

"But obviously the secrecy that is guaranteed is only temporary and provisional. Permanent secrecy would be more than is necessary to render the witness willing. Moreover, it would go too far by creating an opportunity for abuse; since a corrupt witness would be able to utilize it for perjured charges. . . .

"But what are the limits of this temporary secrecy? The answer is, on principle, that it ceases when the grand jury has finished its duties and has either indicted or discharged the persons accused."

B. Privilege May Be Waived By Witness

Wigmore also emphasizes that the secrecy of a witness' testimony is totally a matter of his privilege. He may waive it at any time (§ 2362):

"The privilege, therefore, is not the grand juror's; for he is merely an indifferent mouthpiece of the disclosure. Nor is it entirely the State's; for the State's [fol. 2079] interest is merely the move for constituting the privilege. The theory of the privilege is that the witness is guaranteed against compulsory disclosure; the privilege must therefore be that of the witness, and rests upon his consent."

If, as the criminal cases cited above indicate, even a juror's oath may be relaxed to obtain his version of a witness' testimony, the instant case affords a perfect illustration of the circumstance where the witness' own testimony may be disclosed. Here no attack is being made on the grand jury proceedings, this Court is not being importuned to reweigh probable cause, and no attempt is involved to breach the limited secrecy that surrounds the deliberations of the jury itself.

Rather, access is here sought only to the testimony of witnesses who were not, and could not, be sworn to secrecy. It is sought not to explore or attack the grand jury proceedings but only for the legitimate discovery of relevant facts in subsequent civil proceeding. The Government must concede that the testimony of the witnesses before the grand jury may be elicited on deposition in civil discovery proceedings. In essence, therefore, the Government is reduced to arguing that while a witness is under no obligation of secrecy and while his grand jury testimony may be discovered civilly, the best evidence of that testimony—the transcript—may not be discovered.

Such a position is utterly untenable. It hopelessly confuses the whole notion of privilege. If the witness, as distinct from a jurymen, has any privilege at all, that privilege must go to his testimony, not the record of it. If he may disclose his testimony, what proposition of law or logic denies him access to the best evidence of that testimony. As Judge Hough, in a statement cited with approval by the Supreme Court in the Socony-Vacuum case, [vol. 2080] once observed in Felder v. United States, 9 F. 2d 872, 874 (C.A. 2, 1925) for a Court of Appeals Panel of which Judge Learned Hand was a member:

“The bald fact that the memory refreshing words are found in the records of a grand jury is not a valid objection.”

IV. The Treatment Of Testimony Before Grand Juries Where The Question Arises In A Subsequent Civil Action Must Be Accommodated To Liberal Discovery Rules of Civil Procedure.

The right of access to grand jury testimony in a subsequent civil proceeding poses an extremely narrow question that arises only rarely. The question is confined almost exclusively to a handful of major antitrust cases where the Government has elected to do its civil discovery through the device of the grand jury. It may even be a question of only passing importance since the suggestion has seriously been renewed that the Government be authorized to employ some pre-complaint discovery technique.³ But, in any event, the question here scarcely [fol. 2081] involves the serious policy considerations present in a criminal case.

Even in criminal cases, grand jury testimony may be disclosed, as the above authorities hold, where the interests of justice require. In applying this broad standard, it is exceedingly important to recognize the fundamental changes in policy effected by the adoption of new Federal Rules governing civil procedure. These rules greatly change prior law with respect to disclosure of facts in the hands of an opposing party. The "interests of justice" must not, therefore, be measured in terms of cases prior to the rules, but rather in accordance with the new policy that the rules embody. The instant case affords an almost perfect vehicle

³ Report of the Attorney General's National Committee to Study the Antitrust Laws, p. 345:

"The last alternative is the grand jury. Its use where civil proceedings are contemplated from the outset cannot be justified on the purely formal ground that the Sherman Act defines a criminal offense appropriate for consideration by a grand jury, even though it may later be determined that equitable relief is more appropriate. In reality, resort to grand jury in essentially civil investigations stems from lack of an adequate civil discovery alternative.

"We believe that the use of criminal processes other than for investigation with an eye toward indictment and prosecution subverts the Department's policy of proceeding criminally only against flagrant offenses and debases the law by tarring respectable citizens with the brush of crime when their deeds involve no criminality.

"We recognize that the Department has been handicapped and accept the Judicial Conference conclusion that present civil investigative machinery is inadequate for effective antitrust enforcement. The problem is, therefore, to devise a precomplaint civil discovery process for use where civil proceedings are initially contemplated and voluntary cooperation by those under investigation fails."

for a sensible accommodation of the principle that grand jury testimony will be disclosed when the "interests of justice" require with the liberal spirit that informs the Rules of Civil Procedure.

A. Policy of Criminal Rules

At the outset it must be recognized that even in criminal cases the law now reflects a liberal view towards disclosure of material presented to grand juries. Rules 16 and 17 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure give defendants in federal criminal trials a large measure of disclosure for aid in trial preparation. Rule 16 is relatively limited in scope. Under it defendants may request disclosure of material "obtained from or belonging to the defendant" or "obtained from others by seizure or process." Rule 17(c) which permits a defendant to subpoena documents before trial provides much greater opportunities for disclosure. In Bowman Dairy Co. v. United States, 341 U.S. 214, 71 S. Ct. 675, a criminal case under the Sherman Act, the Supreme Court held that under Rule 17(c) the Government [fol. 2082] could be required to produce in advance of trial evidentiary material consisting of "all documents, books, papers and objects (except memoranda prepared by Government counsel, and documents or papers solicited by or volunteered to Government counsel which consist of narrative statements of persons or memoranda of interviews), obtained by Government counsel, in any manner other than by seizure or process, (a) in the course of investigation by Grand Jury No. 8949 which resulted in the return of the indictment herein, and (b) in the course of the Government preparation for trial of this cause, if such books, papers, documents and objects, (a) have been presented to the Grand Jury; or (b) are to be offered as evidence on the trial of the defendants, or any of them, under said indictment; * * * " (341 U.S. 217, 71 S. Ct. 677)

The Court said:

"Rule 17(c) was not intended to provide an additional means of discovery. Its chief innovation was to expedite the trial by providing a time and place before trial for the inspection of the subpoenaed materials. United States v. Maryland & Virginia Milk Producers Ass'n., D. C., 9 F.R.D. 509. However, the plain words of the Rule are not to be ignored. They must be given their ordinary meaning to carry out the purpose of establishing a more liberal policy for the production, inspection and use of materials at the trial. There was no intention to exclude from the reach of process of the defendant any material that had been used before the grand jury or could be used at the trial. In short, any document or other materials, admissible as evidence, obtained by the Government by solicitation or voluntarily from third persons is subject to subpoena." (341 U.S. 220, 221, 71 S. Ct. 679).

The Bowman case was followed in Fryer v. United States, 207 F. 2d 134, 136 (C.A.D.C. 1953), where the Court of Appeals observed that "the Bowman view * * * leads to the fullest presentation of facts and away from the notion of a trial as a game of combat by surprise."

The Criminal Rules represent a very substantial change in outlook over prior days. Under common law, defendants in criminal trials were for the most part denied all types of disclosure and discovery. The reasons given to justify [fol. 2083] this policy were (1) the supposed likelihood of perjury and tampering with witnesses, and (2) the procedural "advantages" granted a defendant, making it difficult to obtain a conviction. See Comment, Pre-Trial disclosure in Criminal Cases, 60 Yale L. J. 626 (1951). These reasons, plainly rejected by the new Criminal Rules, are remarkably similar to some of those given for grand jury secrecy.

B. Civil Rules

What has been said in Part A above refers only to the spirit of disclosure that now prevails in criminal cases. But the present case is a civil proceeding. As such, it is subject to the sweeping policy in favor of disclosure promulgated by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. It is the purpose of the deposition and discovery rules in civil cases to reduce the elements of chance and guesswork in trials by giving each side a full opportunity to get all available facts. See Pike & Willis, The New Federal Deposition-Discovery Procedure, 38 Col. L. Rev. 1179 (1938). Ragland, Discovery Before Trial (1932). Consistently with this policy, it has been held that "No longer can the time-honored cry of 'fishing expedition' serve to preclude a party from inquiry into the facts underlying his opponent's case." Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 507, 67 S. Ct. 385, 392. The parties to a civil case have every right to "fish" for information in order to discover all relevant facts and all witnesses having knowledge of such facts.

C. Disclosure of Witnesses' Testimony Appropriate In This Case

The present motion is made in a civil proceeding governed by the standards and policies of the federal Civil Rules. Most cases involving grand jury secrecy have arisen in criminal trials—many of the leading ones before the [fol. 2084] liberalizing of criminal procedure under the federal Criminal Rules. Prior to the adoption of these rules the strong policy of the federal courts against giving an accused the right to know the evidence against him placed questions of disclosure of grand jury testimony in an utterly different context from that in which the present motion is made.

The governing rule is stated in terms of achieving substantial justice and this necessarily implies the making of decisions which will give effect either to the policy of disclosure or to that of non-disclosure, depending upon which is strongest in the light of justice. Here the reasons favoring continued grand jury secrecy are exceptionally weak.

The grand jury's term expired over three years ago without indictment. There is no danger that any defendant will escape. Deliberations of the jury—as distinguished from the testimony before it—are not sought. Protection of the innocent is not involved. The danger of perjury or tampering with witnesses is no greater than in any other civil case where pretrial disclosure is permitted. The free and untrammelled disclosure by persons having information of crimes can scarcely be discouraged after a lapse of three years.

In contrast to this absence of any sound reason refusing to disclose the grand jury testimony is the policy governing every civil case—that all evidence known to one side should be available to the other. Moreover, there is nothing to prevent the defendants from taking the depositions of all persons having knowledge of the case, including all witnesses who testified before the grand jury. These witnesses could be asked to state everything that they could recollect having testified to before the grand jury. Necessarily, their recollection is bound to be faulty after a lapse of three years. [fol. 2085] It is submitted that the witnesses should not be subjected to the risk of perjury nor the defendants to the risk of partial information or misinforming when a record of the information possessed by such witnesses is readily available.

The Government, of course, will not assert that the purpose of investing the grand jury with an aura of secrecy is to suborn perjury. If a witness on civil deposition may be compelled to disclose his grand jury testimony, it is difficult to see what end of justice could possibly be served by exposing him to a contradiction to his grand jury testimony.

This seems particularly true where the Government has, itself, used the device of the grand jury to discover its own civil evidence and where it presumably intends to use such evidence at the trial. The Government will use the grand jury transcript at the trial to refresh or impeach as the occasion demands. Meanwhile, even the nature of such testimony is concealed from the defendants.

Such a procedure, even though it may occur only in a handful of antitrust cases, perverts the legitimate functions of the grand jury and defeats utterly the policy of complete disclosure commanded by the Rules of Civil Procedure. Those rules contemplate that in a civil case the Government shall be treated like any other litigant, that it shall no more be entitled to throw a cloak of secrecy around relevant facts than any other party.

The Government should not be permitted to avoid the "fair play" commanded by the Civil Rules by the evasive device of conducting its investigation through a grand jury. Surely under these circumstances any policy favoring grand jury secrecy should yield to the policy of the Civil Rules.

[fol. 2086] V. No Public Policy Forbids Disclosure Of Testimony Where Witness Consents.

It is submitted that a witness' privilege is, at best, temporary, and, whether he consents or not, his testimony may be disclosed in "the interests of justice." However, it seems perfectly obvious that where a witness consents to the disclosure of his testimony no question of public policy is involved at all. As the Court of Appeals for this circuit announced in United States v. Rose, supra, p. 630:

"Since all the defendant desires is a transcript of his own testimony, the sanctity of that which transpired before the Grand Jury is hardly in question. In addition, such disclosure would not subvert any of the reasons traditionally given for the inviolability of Grand Jury proceedings." (Emphasis the court's.)

It was in deference to this principle that Judge Carter in United States v. Standard Oil Co. of California, No. 11584-C, S.D. Calif., Central Div., Pre-Trial Memorandum No. 1, July 6, 1955, recently ordered the disclosure of the testimony of witnesses who consented in circumstances precisely similar to those here.

Conclusion

Should the present motion be denied it will place an immense burden upon the parties to this action and upon the Court. Wasteful and duplicitous deposition discovery proceedings will follow. Their net result will not differ materially from the results sought to be achieved by the present motion, but the orderly preparation of this case [fols. 2087-2088] for trial will be severely prejudiced. Under these circumstances the requirements of "substantial justice" require the granting of this motion.

MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF MOTION BY COLGATE-PALMOLIVE COMPANY FOR DISCLOSURE OF TESTIMONY BEFORE THE GRAND JURY

Summary of Facts

A grand jury was summoned by this Court in May, 1951, and it sat for the full permissible period of 18 months until discharged on November 25, 1952. On December 11, 1952 the present complaint was filed.

During its term there were submitted to that grand jury by the present defendants pursuant to subpoenas large numbers of documents. Most of these documents were produced during the year 1951. In addition, vast quantities of documents were secured by the attorneys for the Government from other companies and individuals, by subpoena [fol. 2096] or otherwise. On May 15, 1953 there was submitted in the present action Plaintiff's General List No. 1, identifying by name all non-defendants whose documents or copies thereof had been in the possession of the plaintiff's trial staff. This list contained a total of 82 companies and individuals.

In addition, a number of witnesses appeared before the grand jury. The defendants are aware of the identity of 28 of these witnesses, who may constitute most of those called. Of these, 27 testified during the period from June 16, 1952 through November 18, 1952. The 28 witnesses had the following positions: current officers and employees of the present defendants at the time of their testimony, 9; former officers and employees of the present defendants, 9; representatives of grocery chain stores, 2; representatives of oil and chemical companies, 2; representative of a meat packer, 1; representative of a tallow broker, 1; representatives of a fats and oils trade journal, 2; representative of a market survey organization, 1; representative of a supplier-competitor, 1.

All of the non-defendant enterprises of which these witnesses were representatives submitted files during the grand jury proceeding and appeared on Plaintiff's General List No. 1 with the exception of the two grocery chain stores.

One of the witnesses, Mr. James A. Reilly, who at the time of his testimony on November 6, 1952 was executive [fol. 2097] vice-president of Colgate-Palmolive Company in charge of soap sales, has subsequently died.

The question presented by the present motion is whether the defendant Colgate-Palmolive Company should be granted the right to inspect and copy the transcript of the testimony of the witnesses before the grand jury.

Point I

The defendants are entitled to inspect and copy the grand jury testimony in the absence of considerations of secrecy.

Certainly if the testimony of this nature were simply sitting in the plaintiff's files, it would be properly subject to production under Rule 34 as documents not privileged, upon a showing of good cause. Thus the Supreme Court has said in Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U. S. 495, 507 (1947):

"We agree, of course, that the deposition-discovery rules are to be accorded a broad and liberal treatment. No longer can the time-honored cry of 'fishing expedition' serve to preclude a party from inquiring into the facts underlying his opponent's case." Mutual

"* * * One of the chief arguments against the 'fishing expedition' objection is the idea that discovery is mutual—that while a party may have to disclose his case, he can at the same time tie his opponent down to a definite position." Pike and Willis, 'Federal Discovery in Operation,' 7 Univ. of Chicago L. Rev. 297, 303."

knowledge of all the relevant facts gathered by both parties is essential to proper litigation. To that end, either party may compel the other to disgorge whatever facts he has in his possession. The deposition-discovery procedure simply advances the stage at which the disclosure can be compelled from the time of trial to the period preceding it, thus reducing the possibility of surprise."

[fol. 2098] With specific reference to statements of witnesses, the Court said:

"We do not mean to say that all written materials obtained or prepared by an adversary's counsel with an eye toward litigation are necessarily free from discovery in all cases. Where relevant and non-privileged facts remain hidden in an attorney's file and where production of those facts is essential to the preparation of one's case, discovery may properly be had. Such written statements and documents might, under certain circumstances, be admissible in evidence or give clues as to the existence or location of relevant facts. Or they might be useful for purposes of impeachment or corroboration. And production might be justified where the witnesses are no longer available or can be reached only with difficulty. Were production of written statements and documents to be precluded under such circumstances, the liberal ideals of the deposition, discovery portions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure would be stripped of much of their meaning." (329 U. S. 511-2)

The grand jury investigation was coextensive with the complaint subsequently filed. This is shown by a mere inspection of the grand jury subpoenas, by the occupations of the witnesses mentioned above and by the statement of the plaintiff's attorneys that their motion dated August 20, 1954 for additional documents was designed to secure material "supplementary" to that secured by grand jury subpoenas. The affidavit of Joseph E. McDowell sworn to August 20, 1954 in support of the plaintiff's motion for production of Colgate documents states:

"With minor exceptions, all of these are either supplementary to documents and records previously furnished by the Company, or relate to matters with [fol. 2099] respect to which substantial information has already been furnished by the Company and the other defendants herein in the course of the investigation of the soap and synthetic detergent industry conducted by the Department of Justice prior to the institution of this action." (p. 3)

The reference to information other than documents can only be to testimony. There can be no doubt that this testimony is relevant and material, or that it falls within the description of the last quotation from Hickman v. Taylor.

In the absence, therefore, of the policy with regard to secrecy of grand jury proceedings set out in Rule 6(e), the defendants would be entitled to access to the testimony before the grand jury. The question is whether that policy is such as to foreclose access here.

Point II

The policy for secrecy of grand jury proceedings is inapplicable in the present circumstances.

A. Disclosure rests in the discretion of the Court

That the disclosure of grand jury testimony in connection with a judicial proceeding is in the discretion of the Court is established by Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure:

"(e) Secrecy of Proceedings and Disclosure. Disclosure of matters occurring before the grand jury other than its deliberations and the vote of any juror may be made to the attorneys for the government for use in the performance of their duties. Otherwise a [fol. 2100] juror, attorney, interpreter or stenographer may disclose matters occurring before the grand jury only when so directed by the court preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding or when permitted by the court at the request of the defendant upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment because of matters occurring before the grand jury. No obligation of secrecy may be imposed upon any person except in accordance with this rule . . ."

In re Bullock, 103 F. Supp. 639 (D.D.C. 1952), shows how broad this discretion is. The decision dealt with an application by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to inspect grand jury testimony to determine whether there had been dereliction of duty by a police inspector. Judge Kirkland allowed inspection of the inspector's own testimony, even though no "judicial proceeding" was pending, although not that of other witnesses, all competent testimony having been given at a previous criminal trial of the inspector. The opinion states:

"If a literal interpretation of F.R.C.P. 6(e) were given it would appear that under the circumstances the Court has no authority to grant the petition before it. See United States v. Owen, D.C., 11 F.R.D. 371, 373. However, by way of interpretation the Federal Courts have extended their jurisdiction so that they may remove the seal of privacy from Grand Jury proceedings when in the Court's discretion the furtherance of justice requires it. (Italics supplied.) Metzler v. United States, 9 Cir. 64 F.2d 203; United States v. Alper, 2 Cir., 156 F.2d 222; United States v. Crolich, D.C., 101 F.Supp. 782." (103 F. Supp. 641)

Point III is devoted to a detailed analysis of the cases which establish this proposition. The Court said further:

[fol. 2101] "In cases of this nature, the sole question to be resolved is which policy shall be served to bring about justice, the one requiring secrecy or the other permitting disclosure?" (103 F. Supp. 642)

This is the question addressed to the Court's discretion by the present motion.

B. The reasons traditionally assigned for secrecy are inapplicable here.

A recent authoritative statement of the traditional reasons assigned for grand jury secrecy appears in United States v. Rose, 215 F.2d 617 (3d Cir. 1954). There the Court said in an opinion by Judge Kalodner:

"Grand Jury proceedings are traditionally secret.
"In United States v. Amazon Industrial Chemical

Corp., D.C.Md. 1931, 55 F.2d 254, 261, the reasons generally given for this rule of secrecy were summarized as follows: (1) To prevent the escape of those whose indictment may be contemplated; (2) to insure the utmost freedom to the grand jury in its deliberations and to prevent persons subject to indictment or their friends from importuning the grand jurors; (3) to prevent subornation of perjury or tampering with the witnesses who may testify before grand jury and later appear at the trial of those indicted by it; (4) to encourage free and untrammelled disclosures by persons who have information with respect to the commission of crimes; (5) to protect innocent accused who is exonerated from disclosure of the fact that he has been under investigation, and from the expense of standing trial where there was no probability of guilt.

"As was to be expected, however, an exception to [fol. 2102] the rule developed when its strict application would defeat the ends of justice.

"In United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 1940, 310 U.S. 150, 234, 60 S. Ct., 811, 849, 84 L. Ed. 1129, the Supreme Court, after stating 'Grand jury testimony is ordinarily confidential' declared 'But after the grand jury's functions are ended, disclosure is wholly proper where the ends of justice require it.' (215 F.2d 628-9).

Of the five reasons assigned for secrecy all but the fourth are patently inapplicable. This reason is: "to encourage free and untrammelled disclosures by persons who have information with respect to the commission of crimes." This reason will be discussed as Point II C.

To the same effect is the discussion of the history and basis for secrecy which occurs in §§ 2360-63 of 8 Wigmore, Evidence (3d ed. 1950). Wigmore finds that the only bases for privilege in subsequent testimony are the secrecy of vote and opinion of the grand jurors and the privilege of witnesses. Again only the latter could be applicable to the present motion, for we do not seek disclosure of any of the deliberations of the grand jury, but only of the testimony of the witnesses who appeared before it.

C. No privilege of secrecy on behalf of witnesses now exists; nor is secrecy possible in the present civil action.

Wigmore in § 2362 states the nature of the privilege for witnesses:

[fol. 2103] "The witnesses and the complainants appearing before the grand jury must be guaranteed temporarily against compulsory disclosure of their testimony and complaints, because otherwise the State could not expect to secure ample quantity of evidence for the information of the grand jury. The secrecy is the State's inducement for obtaining testimony.

"But obviously the secrecy that is guaranteed is only temporary and provisional. Permanent secrecy would be more than is necessary to render the witness willing. Moreover, it would go too far by creating an opportunity for abuse; since a corrupt witness would be able to utilize it for perjured charges. This much is now universally conceded:

"But what are the limits of this temporary secrecy? The answer is, on principle, that it ceases when the grand jury has finished its duties and has either indicted or discharged the persons accused:

"Moreover, when Doe is summoned on a civil trial involving the same matters as the criminal charge, and it is desired to impeach him by his former testimony, all motive for secrecy ends, for the same reasons noted in par. (1), supra. Furthermore, in the other rare contingencies in which his testimony before the grand jury might become relevant (post, § 2363, par. 2), justice requires in any case that Doe should not be exempted from disclosure.

"There remain, therefore, on principle, no cases at all in which, after the grand jury's functions are ended, the privilege of the witnesses not to have their testimony disclosed should be deemed to continue.

"This is, in effect, the law as generally accepted today. It is, however, not usually stated in such [fol. 2104] a broad form. The common phrase is that disclosure may be required 'whenever it becomes necessary in the course of justice.' Disregarding a few local exceptions, this is in practice no narrower a rule than the one above deducible from principle."

Thus any privilege against disclosure of testimony which witnesses before the grand jury discharged three years ago may once have had has now expired. As Wigmore indicates, an assurance of permanent secrecy would go too far and create an opportunity for perjury without fear of detection.

"This discussion is of the common law." The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure introduce an additional factor. Not only has any privilege which the grand jury witnesses may have had ceased; the liberal rules of deposition and discovery make secrecy impossible.

We could take the depositions of the witnesses whose names we know. By questioning each of them about each of the very broad issues of the complaint we could cover most or all of the subjects that could have been raised before the grand jury.

Indeed, we could put direct questions to those witnesses as to what their grand jury testimony was. As Wigmore states, the only privilege relating to their testimony was theirs, and that expired when the grand jury had finished its duties. Rule 6(e) confirms that there is no duty on the part of the witness not to disclose his testimony:

[fol. 2105] "No obligation of secrecy may be imposed upon any person except in accordance with this rule."

The Advisory Committee Note to this subdivision states:

"The rule does not impose any obligation of secrecy on witnesses."

We could locate some or all of the witnesses whose names we do not know by a systematic canvass, through depositions or otherwise, of the various major elements of the industry, and particularly of those individuals and organizations named on Plaintiff's General List No. 1.

All of this would be expensive and time-consuming. It would harass the witnesses, who would have to testify three times, if ultimately called at the trial, at widely separated intervals without access to prior testimony.

More important, this procedure would be inadequate. Already the grand jury testimony is over three years old, and in that interval variations of recollection would surely arise. Also, before the grand jury the witnesses were without counsel and were being questioned under very different circumstances. The form of the testimony, and quit possibly the substance, would be different from what a deposition could produce.

Inadequate for discovery purposes though such depositions might be, however, they would be sufficient in scope to eliminate any substantial "secrecy" of the witnesses' testimony before the grand jury.

[fol. 2106] It is simply a fact that the institution of a civil proceeding, with its broad discovery rules, on the same subject matter as a grand jury investigation, eliminates both the need for secrecy of grand jury testimony and the possibility of it. To preserve the hollow shell, at great inconvenience to parties and witnesses, is not justified under present procedure. No one would benefit, apart from the strategic advantage to the plaintiff of having an extra set of testimony. The result would be restoration to the "big case" of the sporting philosophy of litigation which the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure were designed to eliminate, with the necessary corollary of making the big case even bigger.

D. The plaintiff called the grand jury witnesses for the purpose of discovery relating to the present civil action.

The plaintiff admittedly employed the grand jury in part as a discovery device for use in the present proceeding, as this Court has already found in the opinion of May 11, 1953:

"Government's counsel stated in affidavit form that the purposes of the investigation were, first, determination whether there were violations of Sections 1, 2 and 3 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.A. §§ 1-3, or any of them, or of any other Federal anti-trust laws, and, second, determination as to what action should be taken to enforce those laws through criminal proceedings, civil proceedings or both. He further stated that the investigation and all proceedings incident to it, including the grand jury proceeding, were begun and carried on pursuant to and within instructions to accomplish those purposes." (14 F.R.D. 230, 233)

[fol. 2107] We make no contention that this use of the grand jury was improper. We do say that it is relevant as to what justice now requires.

Moreover, the motion which was disposed of in this opinion dealt with documents. The present motion deals with testimony. The facts as to that testimony lead to the belief that, whatever may have been true of the documentary discovery, some or all of the testimony was secured for the sole purpose of discovery for the present civil action, then in serious contemplation, rather than with any thought of securing an indictment. The issue is not the propriety of this procedure, but whether justice now requires that the civil defendants share in the information obtained.

On May 12, 1955 Hon. Stanley N. Barnes, presently Assistant Attorney General of the United States in charge of the Antitrust Division, appeared before the Special Antitrust Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives. As reported in the official verbatim transcript published by the Bureau of National Affairs, Inc., he testified in part as follows:

"Finally, I suggest you may wish to consider means available to the Department for compelling production of data before a complaint has been filed in a civil procedure. At the present time in the investigation of civil matters, the Department must

"(a) depend upon the voluntary cooperation of [fol. 2108] those under investigation;

"(b) file a civil complaint and make use of discovery processes under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure; or

"(c) make use of the grand jury.

"Those are alternatives.

"From this it seems clear that the sole means for compelling pre-complaint data in civil cases is the grand jury. Some—and I refer to lawyers there primarily—have urged that such use of the grand jury constitutes an abuse of its processes.

“Mr. Maletz. Do you agree with that position, Judge?

“Mr. Barnes. I do not. And my reasons are:—?”

“The Chairman. I am glad to hear you say that. Why? (p. 347)

* * * * *

“Mr. Harkins. In that connection, under the Sherman Act, you can use a grand jury to get evidence solely for a Section 4 injunction proceeding, can you not? There is no abuse of using the court's process to convene a grand jury to secure evidence for you solely in a Section 4 proceeding?

“Mr. Barnes. No, I do not think there is any abuse of it.” (p. 350)

The subject matter of these quotations, and the investigation of the Judiciary Committee, originated with the Report of the Attorney General's National Committee to Study the Antitrust Laws, dated March 31, 1955, of which Committee Judge Barnes was a co-chairman. That report contains a discussion based on the following statement:

[fol. 2109] “In the investigation of civil matters, on the other hand, the Department must:

“(a) depend upon the voluntary cooperation of those under investigation;

“(b) file a civil complaint and make use of discovery processes under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure; or

“(c) make use of the grand jury.

“These procedures do not satisfy civil enforcement needs.” (p. 344)

It is apparent from these statements that the Department of Justice feels free as a general matter to use a grand jury for the sole purpose of civil discovery.

With regard to the present action, however, plaintiff's attorneys have stated that the grand jury proceeding was not conducted purely for discovery with a view toward the civil action. Although this may be so for the proceeding as a whole, it is perfectly apparent from the time sequence that the decision to proceed civilly rather than criminally must have been made some time before the termination of the proceeding. It is in theory possible that an indictment was requested but that the grand jury refused it. This is unlikely, however. On December 11, 1952, the day the complaint was filed, the Department of Justice issued a press release, as is its custom. This release contained two statements of interest here:

[fol. 2110] "The filing of the complaint results from a careful and thorough investigation of the industry, including extensive grand jury proceedings. (pp. 2-3)

* * * * *

"In view of these and other factors, further criminal prosecution of defendants would not be effective in achieving the objectives of the Sherman Act." (p. 4)

The latter statement is presumably intended to imply that no indictment was requested.

Some light as to when the decision not to proceed criminally must have been reached is cast by the address of Marcus A. Hollabaugh, Chief of the Special Litigation Section of the Antitrust Division, given April 1, 1954 and printed in the American Bar Association Section of Antitrust Law Proceedings at the Spring Meeting, Washington, D. C., April 1-2, 1954. Mr. Hollabaugh stated in part:

"The Attorney General, in a discussion of Departmental policy, has stated that 'Criminal proceedings will be limited to the obvious form of per se illegality.' This means that the nature and circumstances of the violation determines the kind of proceeding instituted and the Division (acting under the Attorney General) has the responsibility of deciding which proceeding, civil or criminal, or both, is justified by the facts.

"Since we in the Division are not prophetic, we cannot always know in the early stages of an inquiry as to which, if any, proceeding should be pursued. Generally speaking, the first point where we can make a final decision, based upon the facts, as to the appro-

- p. 19; emphasis added)

The point of this statement is that the decision whether to proceed civilly or criminally depends upon facts. That is [fol. 2111] also one point of the civil investigative demand procedure that Judge Barnes discussed before the Anti-trust Subcommittee:

"I might say before we leave that, that one of the things that concerns me is that the civil investigative demand does not provide an opportunity for a witness to be examined under oath. It merely requires the production of documents.

"I have been informed by those who have had more experience than I, that that production of testimony under oath is not as essential as I would think it would be. But it seems to me that that is one of the matters that requires considerable study." (pp. 348-9)

Most of the files produced for the grand jury were produced during the year 1951. So far as we know, most of the witnesses were called subsequent to June 16, 1952. Thus at the time that the intensive examination of witnesses began the Government attorneys had had for five months or more the material necessary for them to decide whether to proceed civilly or criminally. It is reasonable to assume that by this time they had already decided to proceed civilly, and that they took testimony of witnesses solely for discovery in the civil action.

Certainly some of the witnesses were called solely for the latter purpose. For example, on November 18, 1952 Mr. E. H. Little, the president of Colgate (now chairman of the board), testified. On November 25, 1952 the grand jury was discharged. It strains credulity, and we doubt [fol. 2112] that the plaintiff's attorneys will say, that upon hearing the testimony of Mr. Little the attorneys for the Government then decided they did not have a criminal case and forthwith discontinued the grand jury proceeding (at the expiration of the term of the grand jury, to be sure).

Another quotation from the Report of the Attorney General's Committee has a bearing here. The Report quotes the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division, as follows:

"He has also informed us that before a criminal action is brought the following procedures are currently invoked:

"In the first instance a recommendation is made by the attorney in charge of the particular investigation. If he is in the field, his recommendation is then reviewed by his field office chief. It is then reviewed by the appropriate litigation section chief in Washington. The section chief's decision is reviewed by the first or second assistant to the Assistant Attorney General and by the Assistant Attorney General. Review at the various levels is effected not only by oral conferences, but also by written memoranda of facts detailing the evidence against each proposed defendant." (p. 350)

It does not require an intimate acquaintance with federal administrative procedure to see that this sort of thing will take time. The grand jury's term expired on or about November 25, 1952. If the attorney in charge of the case for the Government were planning to recommend a criminal action, he would certainly have put himself in a position to do so well in advance of that date; or if he made such a [fol. 2113] recommendation he must have done so well ahead, and not on the basis of the testimony of witnesses called in the latter months of the term.

There is yet another bit of evidence. The complaint is long and, to state it mildly, comprehensive. It was filed two weeks and two days after the discharge of the grand jury, with Thanksgiving intervening. We doubt very much that it was drafted and approved during that interval, but suggest that it was in the works long before.

Thus, some or all of the witnesses were not called as "persons who have information with respect to the commission of crimes", in the language of United States v. Rose, whose "free and untrammelled disclosures" are to be encouraged. They were called as persons having information useful in a civil proceeding. For this reason alone, no secrecy should attach to their testimony, even as a technical matter. Justice requires that testimony secured for the sole purposes of use in a civil action should be made available to the defendants in that civil action.

E. The plaintiff has used testimony before the grand jury in preparation of the present civil action.

In any event, whatever the purpose in securing it, there can be no argument that testimony before the grand jury has been used by the plaintiff in its preparation of the [fol. 2114] present case. We are sure that plaintiff's attorneys will not say otherwise.

The tentative statements of issues are clearly based at least in part upon such testimony. As an example, tentative statement II B 4 re Advertising and Promotion, relating to "assurances" by Lever, could hardly fail to have come from this source.

The very fact that prior to the taking of any depositions, and apparently with no plans for taking any, the plaintiff's attorneys are in a position to prepare tentative statements of issues indicates, at least until the present, an intention on their part to stand pat on the grand jury testimony for oral discovery purposes.

We refer again, also, to Mr. McDowell's affidavit of August 20, 1954 discussed in Point I, on the supplementary nature of the material sought in the plaintiff's motion for production.

This one-sided discovery is a subversion of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. If the Government chooses to proceed in civil litigation it should be willing to proceed under the rules applicable to civil litigation. United States v. Cotton Valley Operators Committee, 9 F.R.D. 719 (W.D.La. 1949), aff'd by an equally divided Court, 339 U.S. 940 (1950), is an example of this philosophy. The case was a civil action under the Sherman Act, in the course of which the Government refused to submit to the Court for a [fol. 2115] ruling on privilege documents called for by a Rule 34 motion, including among other things reports of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The lower court said:

"* * * to sustain this contention, would in effect, amount to an abdication of the Court's duty to decide the matter and leave it entirely in the hands of the Attorney General; * * *." (9 F.R.D. 720)

Accordingly the Court dismissed the cause for failure to comply with its order.

Here, where it is apparent that the plaintiff has used and will use the material in question, disclosure should not be denied on the basis of any plea of the plaintiff.

F. The plaintiff has no claim of privilege with respect to the grand jury testimony.

Unlike the situation in the Cotton Valley Operators case, the grand jury transcripts are not properly speaking documents in the possession, custody or control of the plaintiff, within the meaning of Rule 34. They are not documents as to which the plaintiff can claim a privilege, within the meaning of that rule. They do not contain state secrets, certainly. They are, rather, documents in the custody of this Court to which the plaintiff's attorneys have such access as Rule 6 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and this Court grant to them.

[fol. 2116] The plaintiff's attorneys do not appear here as agents of the court or of the grand jury or of the Government in the prosecution of crime. They appear as attorneys for a civil plaintiff with the advantage of private access to certain relevant material. The responsibility for the determination of the issue of secrecy is entirely based upon this Court by Rule 6(e), which places upon the plaintiff's attorneys merely the responsibility of making disclosure only when so directed by this Court. The plaintiff's attorneys cannot properly assume the role of advisors to the Court on this issue. As attorneys for a civil litigant, their arguments against disclosure necessarily boil down to this: that they have an advantage and they want to keep it.

The plaintiff's attorneys do not say, nor can they very well say, that they gave the witnesses who appeared before the grand jury assurance that their testimony would never be made public. Such an assurance would have been a usurpation of the function of this Court. It would also have embodied an incorrect statement of the law, as the following discussion shows. No claim of privilege by the plaintiff can arise from this source.

Point III

Under the applicable decisions disclosure should be granted.

A. Criminal cases allow disclosure as justice requires; cases involving attacks on the sufficiency of indictments are inapplicable.

There are a great many opinions in which a defendant in a criminal case has been denied access to the minutes of the grand jury that indicted him, when his purpose was to attack the indictment. The consideration here is obviously a practical one in the administration of justice and has nothing to do with the reasons for secrecy of grand jury proceedings, such as those discussed in United States v. Rose and other cases. If a defendant could raise the question easily that insufficient evidence had been presented to the grand jury for an indictment, the courts would have to try every case twice, once to determine the propriety of the indictment and again to determine guilt. The courts are certainly not going to undertake that burden, nor should they be asked to do so. As Judge Learned Hand points out in United States v. Garsson, 291 Fed. 646 (S.D.N.Y. 1923); the criminal accused has every advantage, and he does not require this one.

Some of the more extreme statements on the subject of non-access to grand jury minutes, in fact, stem directly from the forceful dicta of Judge Learned Hand in cases of [fol. 2118] sort. These appear occasionally in other types of cases, although there is no reason to suppose that Judge Hand intended these statements to apply to anything but attacks on the indictment.

Judge Hand's first decision on the subject is United States v. Violon, 173 Fed. 501 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1909). This is a one-paragraph opinion the tenor of which is shown by the first sentence:

"I cannot satisfactorily speculate upon the evidence which must have been before the grand jury, nor will I either myself inspect, or permit another to inspect, its minutes."

It should be noted that the concept of secrecy does not enter into the opinion. The point made is this:

"There is no precedent, as far as I can find, for such control of the grand jury, and I am the last who would initiate it."

The case most commonly cited is United States v. Garsion. This is quoted in full on the point in question, because it is important to show the kind of case it was and the philosophy behind it.

"Finally, the defendants, recognizing that it is difficult to make a case for quashal by the scraps of evidence accessible, move for inspection of the grand jury's minutes. I am no more disposed to grant it than I was in 1909. U. S. v. Violon (C.C.) 173 Fed. 501. It is said to lie in discretion, and perhaps it does, but no judge of this court has granted it, and I hope none ever will. Under our criminal procedure the accused has every advantage. While the prosecution is held rigidly to the charge, he need not disclose the barest outline of his defense. He is immune from question or comment [fol. 2119] on his silence; he cannot be convicted when there is the least fair doubt in the minds of any one of the twelve. Why in addition he should in advance have the whole evidence against him to pick over at his leisure, and make his defense, fairly or foully, I have never been able to see. No doubt grand juries err and indictments are calamities to honest men, but we must work with human beings and we can correct such errors only at too large a price. Our dangers do not lie in too little tenderness to the accused. Our procedure has been always haunted by the ghost of the innocent man convicted. It is an unreal dream. What we need to fear is the archaic formalism and the watery sentiment that obstructs, delays, and defeats the prosecution of crime." (291 Fed. 649)

Again there is no allusion to secrecy. The objection is to being asked to second-guess the grand jury. Judge Hand thinks further that the accused should not "in advance have the whole evidence against him to pick over at his leisure." But this is the very right which the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure give to the civil defendant. Nothing in this opinion has the least bearing on obtaining for discovery purposes in a civil action testimony of witnesses before a grand jury. Yet there is reason to believe, as will be discussed later, that the two civil cases denying inspection which the plaintiff has previously cited stem in large part from the single sentence quoted above:

"It is said to lie in discretion, and perhaps it does, but no judge of this court has granted it, and I hope none ever will."

Cases dealing with the use of specific testimony, as distinguished from attacks on the sufficiency of the indictment, [fol. 2120] have rarely contained such language, the question there being simply that of secrecy. The rule is that expressed by the Supreme Court in a statement in United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 233-4 (1940):

"Grand jury testimony is ordinarily confidential. See Wigmore, supra, § 2362. But after the grand jury's functions are ended, disclosure is wholly proper where the ends of justice require it. See Metzler v. United States, 64 F.2d 203, 206."

Atwell v. United States, 162 Fed. 97 (4th Cir. 1908), in an early expression of this rule, reversed a contempt citation against a grand juror for disclosure of testimony of witnesses before the grand jury. The Court said:

"To what extent, then, does the policy of the law require this secrecy to be maintained? In general terms it may be answered: To the full extent necessary to fulfill the ends of justice, and no further. Very certain it is that it should be maintained during the sittings and deliberations of the grand jury, for its sole province is to make a preliminary and ex parte investigation, to ascertain if probable cause for presentment be found. * * *

* * * What reason, therefore, can exist why the grand jurors, under such conditions, should be bound to secrecy? We can see none; and for these reasons we hold this fourth obligation of the grand juror's oath to require secrecy only so long as the policy of the law requires, and that that policy does not require it, so far as the evidence adduced before the grand jury is concerned, after presentment and indictment found, made public, and custody of the accused had, and the grand jury finally discharged." (162 Fed. 100-1)

Rule 6(e) would seem to make approval of disclosure by the Court necessary now, but the same principles apply.

[fol. 2121] In United States v. Byoir, 147 F.2d 336 (5th Cir. 1945), the Court approved the disclosure on the petition of a defendant indicted in New York of grand jury minutes relating to an indictment of the same defendant in Texas, later dismissed, provided that the New York court held the evidence relevant and admissible. The Court expressed doubt as to the admissibility in the New York proceeding, but said:

"On the merits of the appeal, the judge has discretionary authority to permit disclosure of what happened before the grand jury, when necessary to advance the cause of justice." (147 F.2d 337)

The New York court subsequently quashed a subpoena for the transcript. This fact, however, does not affect the holding.

United States v. Alper, 156 F.2d 222 (2d Cir. 1946), was a case on which Judge Learned Hand sat. The question was whether the district court properly refused to read a witness's grand jury testimony at the request of accused's counsel to ascertain whether it was contradictory to that he gave at the trial. The Court stated in an opinion by Judge Swan:

"After an indictment has been found and the accused apprehended, the veil of secrecy surrounding grand jury proceedings may safely be lifted where justice so requires. [Citations] * * * Whether the power should be exercised lies, like other matters pertaining to the conduct of a trial, within the court's discretion. In the case at bar it is unnecessary to determine whether there was an abuse of discretion in declining to have the minutes written up, since the case must be reversed for error in the instructions already discussed. But as the same question may arise on the new trial it [fol. 2122] seems desirable to refer to some of the matters which the judge should take into account in exercising his discretion. These will include the timeliness of the request for the minutes, the delay in the trial which may result, and the extent of the burden which will be imposed upon the judge by a comparison of the witness's grand jury testimony with his trial testimony." (156 F.2d 226)

After further discussion the Court concluded:

"A great part of the law of evidence is based upon the practical difficulties that would incidentally arise from the admission of what, strictly speaking, is logically relevant; it is founded upon the recognition that here, as elsewhere in the law, we are seeking not logical perfection but the just settlement of a controversy. The duty we are discussing is preeminently in this class and it is particularly one about which it would be unsafe to generalize." (156 F.2d 226)

It will be noted that Judge Learned Hand concurred in this opinion. The reason is plain: the request involved no attack on the grand jury proceeding. Equally, the concept of secrecy was dismissed in a sentence. What concerned the Court was solely the practical aspect of what was requested.

United States v. Remington, 191 F.2d 246 (2d Cir. 1951), cert. denied, 343 U.S. 907 (1952), dealt with the right of a defendant indicted for perjury for testimony given before the grand jury to have access to that testimony. In an opinion, again by Judge Swan with Judge Learned Hand concurring it was held an abuse of discretion to deny him such access. The same problem was presented to this Court shortly thereafter in United States v. White, 104 F. [fol. 2123] Supp. 120 (D.N.J. 1952), and the same result was reached.

The most recent Court of Appeals case is United States v. Rosa in the Third Circuit, quoted in Point II B above, which also had this problem. As the quotation given shows, in reversing the District Court's refusal to permit disclosure of the defendant's testimony, the Court adopted the statement of the Supreme Court in the Socony-Vacuum case.

The subject was also considered recently by Mr. Justice Douglas, sitting as a Circuit Justice, in granting an application for bail by a defendant convicted in California, Herzog v. United States, 75 Sup.Ct. 349 (1955). The defendant in his appeal had raised among other things the fact that his counsel had not been permitted on cross-examination of a critical witness to inspect the grand jury testimony for impeachment purposes. Mr. Justice Douglas held that this was "a substantial question which should be determined by the appellate court" within the meaning of Rule 46(a)(2) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. He said:

"There has been a conflict between the policy requiring secrecy of grand jury minutes and the policy which seeks to leave no stone unturned in seeking justice in a particular case. See In re Bullock, D.C., 103 F.Supp. 639. Rule 6(e) has partially resolved that conflict by allowing disclosure of the grand jury minutes 'in connection with a judicial proceeding.' " (75 Sup.Ct. 352)

After quoting at great length from United States v. Alper, he concluded:

[fol. 2124] "It is obvious that, whatever the ultimate outcome, under that ruling Herzog's request for inspection of the grand jury minutes would have been treated differently in New York than it was in California. Which is the better way of handling the matter, or whether there is still another which is to be preferred, is a considerable question in the administration of justice.

"I express no opinion on the merits. I only conclude that the question is a 'substantial' one 'which should be determined' by the Court of Appeals, within the meaning of Rule 46(a)(2)." (75 Sup.Ct. 353)

Thus there are two distinct types of criminal cases. The first embodies an attempt to secure grand jury minutes in order to have an indictment set aside for irregularity. It almost never succeeds. It is what Judge Learned Hand opposed so strongly. It does not properly raise the issue of secrecy but rather that of orderly procedure, although reference to secrecy is made in some of the opinions. Yet even this principle is not as absolute as Judge Learned Hand once indicated. See, for example, the recent discussion of the problem by Judge Irving Kaufman in United States v. Wolrich, 127 F.Supp. 215 (S.D.N.Y. 1955). Rule 6(e) itself gives the Court discretion to inquire into the grand jury proceedings on a showing by the defendant of grounds for a motion to dismiss the indictment. However, we do not explore this subject further because it is not relevant here.

The second type of criminal case deals with a motion to inspect testimony for use for a particular purpose. The [fol. 2125] rule in these cases is (1) that grand jury proceedings are ordinarily secret, but (2) that when the grand jury's functions are ended (3) disclosure is wholly proper where the ends of justice require it. The courts then consider whether in the particular circumstances justice requires such disclosure. This rule has been stated by the Second, Third, Fourth and Fifth Circuit Courts of Appeals and by the Supreme Court itself. These statements assume greater force when it is recognized that these were criminal cases, where the liberal rules of discovery do not prevail. A general right to discovery was not in them a factor in determining what the ends of justice require, as it is in the present civil litigation.

B. To refuse disclosure would be contrary to the rationale of Bowman Dairy Co. v. United States.

A case arising in a somewhat different way from those discussed casts a good deal of light on the Supreme Court's liberal approach to discovery, and to its policy of putting the defendant on as nearly an equal footing as possible with the Government, even in criminal actions. This case is Bowman Dairy Co. v. United States, 341 U.S. 214 (1951).

The defendants had been indicted for violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. Before trial they moved by means of subpoena under Rule 17(e) of the Federal Rules of [fol. 2126] Criminal Procedure for production by the Government of documents and other material secured by means other than seizures or process; and the District Court granted the motion and entered an order. The Government argued that Rule 16 relating to materials secured by seizure or process exhausted the right to material in custody of Government attorneys, and objected to disclosure of confidential informants. Production under the order was refused. The Government attorney with possession of the material was then held in contempt. The Court of Appeals reversed, and the Supreme Court granted certiorari.

The subpoena called for all material secured by means other than seizure or process in the course of the grand jury investigation or in the course of preparation for trial if such items:

"(a) have been presented to the Grand Jury; or (b) are to be offered as evidence on the trial of the defendants, or any of them, under said indictment; or (c) are relevant to the allegations or charges contained in said indictment, whether or not they might constitute evidence . . . " (341 U.S. 217)

Mr. Justice Minton wrote the opinion for the Court, saying:

"There was no intention to exclude from the reach of process of the defendant any material that had been used before the grand jury or could be used at the trial. In short, any document or other materials, admissible as evidence, obtained by the Government by solicitation or voluntarily from third persons is subject to subpoena. It was material of this character which the Government was unwilling to stipulate to produce or to produce in obedience to the subpoena. [fol. 2127] Such materials were subject to the subpoena. Where the court concludes that such materials ought to be produced, it should, of course, be solicitous to protect against disclosures of the identity of informants, and the method, manner and circumstances of the Government's acquisition of the materials." (341 U.S. 220)

The Court held, however, that clause (c) was a "catch-all provision, not intended to produce evidentiary materials but is merely a fishing expedition to see what may turn up." It was held invalid, and since the subpoena was bad in part, the attorney should not have been held in contempt. All concurred except Mr. Justice Black, who voted to affirm the District Court, and Mr. Justice Clark, who did not participate.

No mention was made at all of the secrecy of the grand jury proceedings, though certainly "material that had been used before the grand jury" would comprise "matters occurring before the grand jury" within the meaning of Rule 6(e) as much as would testimony. In fact, by striking the catch-all provision and limiting discovery to material presented to the grand jury and material to be offered as evidence at the trial, the Court increased the isolation of material used before the grand jury. It will be noted also that discovery as to these items was treated as a matter of right, not as a matter of discretion.

The case is significant not only for its treatment of the [fol. 2128] the grand jury issue but also as showing the disposition of the Supreme Court to give the antitrust defendant, within the utmost limits of the rules applicable, and even in criminal cases, full discovery. Once again, as in the Cotton Valley Operators case, the claims of the Government to a privileged position were disregarded.

C. Those civil cases which deny access to grand jury testimony should not be followed.

There remains the question of access to grand jury testimony for use in subsequent civil proceedings.

As far as secrecy is concerned, the rule must necessarily be the same—that "after the grand jury's functions are ended, disclosure is wholly proper where justice requires it", in the words of the Supreme Court in the Socony-Vacuum case. Justice is the right of civil litigants, too.

In a civil case, what constitutes justice must be decided on the basis of the rules for civil litigation. Liberal discovery rules entitle a defendant to access to all relevant material available to the plaintiff. Mutuality is a principle of civil discovery, and the supplying by the defendants to the plaintiff of documents and testimony of a highly confidential nature deserves consideration. Justice does not lie in the preservation of a secrecy for which no rational basis exists.

[fol. 2129] In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 4 F. Supp. 283 (E.D.Pa. 1933), allowed the disclosure by Government attorneys, in a proceeding elsewhere to revoke a beer permit, of testimony before a grand jury still sitting. Judge Kirkpatrick said:

"It is sufficient to say that the rule of secrecy has long since been relaxed by permitting disclosure whenever the interest of justice requires. The determination of this matter necessarily rests largely within the discretion of the court whose grand jury is concerned. (4 F. Supp. 284)

"The fact that the grand jury has adjourned and been discharged has often been considered as one reason for abandoning secrecy as to its deliberations. It is, however, not the only circumstance which may move the court, nor is it essential to the exercise of its discretion. It yields to the general consideration whether the ends of justice will be furthered by the disclosure. In every case the court is called upon to balance two policies, the one requiring secrecy, the other disclosure." (4 F. Supp. 285)

The plaintiff has previously cited two civil cases which reach a contrary conclusion. These are United States v. General Motors Corp., 15 F.R.D. 486 (D.Del. 1954), and an unreported discussion from the bench in United States v. Morgan, Civil 43-757 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 8, 1948).

Both of these cases are distinguishable on the facts. In addition, both decisions embody an incorrect statement of the law. In each Judge Learned Hand's famous sentence in the Garsson case was applied in a manner in [fol. 2130] which its context in that case shows it was never intended to be used. Neither case should serve as a precedent in the decision of the pending motion.

The factual situation in United States v. General Motors Corp. was entirely different from the present case. It was an action for triple damages under the Elkins Act. The claim was that Baltimore & Ohio Railroad had favored General Motors with a rebate. Two grand juries investigated under the criminal provisions of the Elkins Act. The first indicted the railroad, and the second returned a "no true bill" in General Motors' favor. Thereafter, the statute of limitations having run on further criminal proceedings, the present action was begun against General Motors alone. A motion was filed under Rule 34 for the production of transcripts of the two grand jury proceedings. Judge Leahy, after an extended discussion, concluded:

"My beliefs coincide with those expressed by Judge Learned Hand in U. S. v. Garsson, D.C., 291 F. 646, 649; 'It [i.e., the disclosure of the transcript] is said to lie in discretion, and perhaps it does but no judge of this court has granted it, and I hope none ever will.' " (15 F.R.D. 488)

In support of the denial the Court in a footnote cited 22 cases also denying disclosure. Of these, 19 were cases where the defendant asked for the transcript in order to attack the indictment. The remaining three cases cited were Metzler v. United States, 64 F.2d 203 (9th Cir. 1933); [fol. 2131] United States v. Cohen, 145 F.2d 82 (2d Cir. 1945), cert. denied, 323 U.S. 799 (1945), which without discussion held it not error to refuse inspection of testimony of a witness who had died before trial and whose testimony would be hearsay; and United States v. Owen, 11 F.R.D. 371 (W.D.Mo. 1951), which reached a conclusion opposite from that of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals in United States v. Rose and this Court in United States v. White as to the right of a perjury defendant to his own testimony.

None of these cases is applicable. The discussion in none of them confirms Judge Leahy's analysis except United States v. Owen, in which the holding was directly opposed to the law in this Circuit. Indeed in Metzler v. United States in approving use at the trial of defendants' statements before the grand jury the Court said:

"After the indictment has been found and made public and the defendants apprehended, the policy of the law does not require the same secrecy as before. Atwell v. U.S. (C.C.A. 4), 162 F. 97, 100, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1049, 15 Ann. Cas. 253; U.S. v. Amazon Industrial Chem. Corp., supra. Where the ends of justice can be furthered thereby and when the reasons for secrecy no longer exist, the policy of the law requires that the veil of secrecy be raised." (64 F.2d 206)

United States v. Rose was decided subsequently in the Third Circuit. That case proceeds to its conclusion by a train of reasoning absolutely incompatible with the discussion of the law in the General Motors decision, which [fol. 2132] has accordingly been robbed of whatever force it may have had.

The ruling in United States v. Morgan was made in the course of a colloquy with counsel, and it is difficult to put it in context. The substance of the discussion appears at pages 276-279 of the record, which are contained in Appendix A to the plaintiff's brief dated November 1, 1954 in opposition to the original motion of Procter & Gamble. Judge Medina's position is expressed by the following statements:

"The Court: Mr. Carson, I think you are wasting time on this part about getting me to direct that the Government give the defendants copies of the Grand Jury minutes. I have been thinking about that a good deal since I read these briefs, and I just am not going to be the first Judge in this District to do that. I think it is a very unwise thing to do. (pp. 276-7)

"The Court: No, I think my mind is set on it: It may be that I have been unduly affected by that statement of Judge Learned Hand. It may be my experience over the years in these matters has so solidified my judgment that I am not open to argument on it, and I may be wrong, but I do believe I am past the point where the argument would persuade me." (pp. 278-9)

An inspection of the file indicates that by a motion dated October 20, 1948 the defendants had served upon the plaintiff a notice of motion for production of all documents in the plaintiff's possession "in connection with this action, or with the investigation conducted by the plaintiff preliminary to the commencement of this action." In some manner not shown in the file the question of grand jury minutes arose, and on December 7, 1948 an 8-page memorandum requesting access to such minutes was filed.

This memorandum recited that no such request had been made in the motion but appealed to the Court's discretion.

It was this situation with which Judge Medina dealt on the following day, December 8, 1948. As the discussion on the record shows, only one of the 11 independent law firms acting as counsel appears to have been disposed to argue the matter. The need for access was not like that in the present case. In United States v. Morgan the plaintiff did not as here rest on the grand jury testimony, but began early to take extensive depositions. At the time of the argument on December 8, 1948, three depositions had been taken and 14 additional depositions had been noticed. Our information does not show the extent to which the grand jury proceeding and the complaint were co-extensive, or how much the grand jury was used for civil discovery.

It is impossible to say, of course, what weight these factors had with Judge Medina.

This ruling came quite early in the post-war development of the big case. It was not until three years later that the Report of the Judicial Conference, 13 F.R.D. 62 (Sept. 26, 1951), was published. The ruling also preceded [fol. 2134] cases placing the Government on the same level as the defendants in antitrust cases, such as the Bowman Dairy and Cotton Valley Operators cases. In addition, it is apparent that it was based largely on Judge Learned Hand's inapplicable dictum.

The Morgan and General Motors cases thus suffer from the same defect, and they should not be followed. For the reasons discussed before, the motion for disclosure of the testimony of all witnesses before the grand jury should be granted.

Point IV

As a minimum, disclosure should be granted as to those witnesses who consent.

A. Consent of the witness is a recognized basis for disclosure of testimony.

The only reason assigned for grand jury secrecy which is remotely relevant in the present case is inducement of witnesses to testify. The privilege thus extended to witnesses expired when the grand jury's functions ended. These subjects were considered in Points II B and C. But even if the privilege had not ended, it would surely be competent for a witness to waive it and consent to disclosure. Thus 8 Wigmore, Evidence § 2362 says:

"The privilege, therefore, is not the grand juror's; for he is merely an indifferent mouthpiece of the disclosure. Nor is it entirely the State's; for the State's [fol. 2135] interest is merely the motive for constituting the privilege. The theory of the privilege is that the witness is guaranteed against compulsory disclosure; the privilege must therefore be that of the witness, and rests upon his consent."

United States v. Rose is in accord. In permitting the defendant to have access to his own testimony before the grand jury, the Court said:

"Since all the defendant desires is a transcript of his own testimony, the sanctity of that which transpired before the Grand Jury is hardly in question. In addition, such disclosure would not subvert any of the reasons traditionally given for the inviolability of Grand Jury proceedings." (215 F.2d 630)

In re Bullock contained an assumption by the Court that such a consent would be sufficient, although it was not actually forthcoming:

"Since the respondent declined voluntarily to consent to the disclosure of the Grand Jury minutes, this opinion will be concerned with the Court's power under the first part of Criminal Rule 6(e)." (103 F. Supp. 641)

There is one unreported case precisely in point, United States v. Standard Oil Co. of California, No. 11584-C (S.D. Cal. July 6, 1955). Attached as Appendix A is the part of the opinion which relates to grand jury testimony. On the general subject, Judge Carter said:

"There are valid reasons why grand jury transcripts should not be made public. The citizen should be permitted to testify without fear that his testimony will be made public. This objective is served if the witness is given the right to determine if his testimony [fol. 2136] shall be thereafter made public. No bars however can come in this case, from supplying the defendants with the names of those testifying before the grand jury."

This approach appears unduly restrictive; but it is certainly preferable to an absolute bar to discovery. It is also an approach that has never been rejected, so far as we can discover. Specifically it was not considered in either United States v. Morgan or United States v. General Motors Corp.

It is difficult to imagine what harm could come from this procedure. If the witness consents, there is no reason for the plaintiff to object. Counsel for the plaintiff profess to see a threat to the future functioning of the grand jury system. Unless the attorneys for the Government are in the custom of assuring witnesses that their testimony will never be disclosed even if they consent to disclosure, the threat is hard to discern.

B. Disclosure of consenting witnesses' testimony would continue the procedure already in operation for documents.

After the submission of Plaintiff's General List No. 1 dated May 15, 1953, the plaintiff's attorneys undertook the burden of getting in touch with all of those on the list and asking whether they would consent to disclosure [fol. 2137] to the defendants of the documents in the possession of the plaintiff.

Subsequently there was entered a stipulation which was approved by this Court on July 15, 1953 giving the defendants the right to inspect and copy the documents of 37 of these non-defendants who consented. The plaintiff and the defendants have since that time cooperated in obtaining the consents of additional non-defendants.

No question was raised by the plaintiff as to propriety or usefulness of this procedure. Yet, with the exception of the grocery chain store representatives, the witnesses represent the same non-defendant business entities, so far as we now know.

It is hard to see as a matter of principle why this consent system should be accepted readily as to documents but rejected as a threat to the future functioning of the grand jury system in the case of testimony.

We submit that the consent procedure has already proved itself to be proper and useful. The explanation for the plaintiff's inconsistent position must be that it knew, in view of the Bowman Dairy case and other cases, that it could not preserve its advantage as to documents; but it is still striving earnestly to do so as to testimony.

Conclusion.

It is respectfully submitted that the motion for disclosure of testimony before the grand jury should be granted.

[fol. 2139] APPENDIX A TO MEMORANDUM

Filed July 6, 1955, Clerk, U. S. District Court, Southern District of California, by Deputy Clerk.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA, CENTRAL DIVISION

No. 11584-C

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Plaintiff,

v.

STANDARD OIL OF CALIFORNIA, et al, Defendant

COURT'S PRETRIAL MEMORANDUM No. 1

CARTER, James M., District Judge.

The defendants, Standard, Shell, Texas, Richfield, General Petroleum, Tidewater and Union Oil, have filed sets of interrogatories to which plaintiff has filed objections.

The matter was briefed, argued and heretofore submitted. The interrogatories are very extensive—in fact it might be said that the defendants ask to know about everything in plaintiffs files in the way of documents, FBI reports, grand jury transcripts, names of all witnesses interviewed, and all [fols. 2140] statements taken. The defendants use the terms “prepared for or submitted to grand juries” and “read or used” by plaintiff’s attorneys, in the preparation of this case, as a supposed limitation. The plaintiff, in turn, resists with a broad opposition, raising so-called government privilege, informer’s privilege, secrecy of FBI reports and grand jury transcripts, relevancy, etc.

The purpose of defendants’ interrogatories, insofar as documents are concerned, is to secure an identification of them so that thereafter a motion to produce may be made. In this particular respect, and generally, the court has indicated that it intended to cut through form, and if possible avoid the necessity of further motions.

Mr. Lasky suggested at the argument, that the court might enter some sort of a pretrial order, stating the principles which it thought applicable to the problem, and that with the guidance of that set of principles, counsel might solve the problem. (TR. 167) In view of the broad scope of the requests and the broad opposition, the court thinks this desirable.

The court will therefore discuss some of the problems involved; will not at this time make an order but will indicate what rules and principles are involved and what action [fol. 2141] the court may take as to the various categories involved in the interrogatories.

I

Grand jury transcripts and testimony.

There are valid reasons why grand jury transcripts should not be made public. The citizen should be permitted to testify without fear that his testimony will be made public. This objective is served if the witness is given the right to determine if his testimony shall be thereafter made public. No bars however can come in this case, from supplying the defendants with the names of those testifying before the grand jury.

The court proposes:—

1. That the plaintiff supply the name and identification of all witnesses appearing before the 1947-1948 grand jury, except "informers" as hereafter discussed. The "in camera" report shows a total of 42 witnesses; 17 were then officers or employees of defendants, and supply the name and identification of each witness appearing before the 1939 grand jury, which plaintiff proposes to use at the trial of the action. The "in camera" report shows 7 of such witnesses at the 1939 session.

[fol. 2142] 2. That if the written consent of a witness be obtained, a copy of the transcript of such witness's testimony be supplied the defendants. If such witness consents, then obviously there is no informer privilege to be protected. This would probably make available all the transcripts of the executives and officers of defendant corporations.

The consent of each witness should only be obtained by addressing a letter to him, asking for consent, and enclosing a form on which the consent may be endorsed. The letter and form of consent should be approved by the court.

The defendants should undertake the obtaining of the consents.

3. That the government go over the list of witnesses before the grand jury at the 1947-1948 session, and eliminate from this list of witnesses to be supplied, those witnesses whom the government considers to be "informers" and only such informers, as the government does not intend to call as witnesses in the trial of this action. That the government submit to the court "in camera," the names of such alleged informers who the government does not intend to call as witnesses at the trial of this action, and supply (a) a summary of the evidence by each such witness, and (b) the reasons why the government considers him to be an "informer."

[fol. 2143] 4. If any such claim of informer privilege is made by plaintiff and sustained by the court after inspection of such "in camera" material, the court intends to direct that the identity of the informer be not revealed, and that all facts leading to his identity be withheld, but that a summary of the witness's testimony be supplied to the defendants.

5. The government has agreed to supply names of all witnesses to be called at the trial, and summaries of their testimony. Query, as to supplying defendants a copy of the grand jury testimony of such witnesses, where no consent has been obtained. The fact that the government intends to call the witness and to supply a summary of his testimony, makes the question as to supplying of a copy of his grand jury testimony, appear almost moot.

6. Defendants disclaim any interest in the 1939 grand jury transcripts, other than as to those witnesses who will be called at this trial.

7. In conclusion, this will leave a residue of witnesses—

- (a) not executives or officers of defendants
- (b) not informers
- (c) who do not consent, and [fols. 2144-2145] (d) who the plaintiff does not intend to call.

The list would be short; defendants would have name and identification, and could interview them. The fact that they were not being called by plaintiff would indicate their testimony had no value to plaintiff's case.

Dated: July 6, 1955.

James M. Carter, United States District Judge.

[fol. 2146] IN UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY

[Title omitted]

BRIEF OF THE UNITED STATES IN OPPOSITION TO MOTIONS FOR PRODUCTION OF GRAND JURY TRANSCRIPTS—December 7, 1955

Each of the defendants has moved the Court to compel disclosure of the transcripts of testimony of all witnesses who appeared before a grand jury sitting in Newark from

May 1951 through November 25, 1952, in connection with an investigation of possible violations of the antitrust laws of the United States in the soap and synthetic detergent industry.

The defendant Lever in its motion also asks that plaintiff be required to furnish the names of the witnesses appearing before said grand jury, but Procter states in its motion that the names of most if not all of the witnesses before the grand jury are already known, and Colgate states on page 2 of its memorandum in support of its motion that the defendants are aware of the identity of twenty-eight grand jury witnesses, and that eighteen of said twenty-eight were then or had previously been officers and employees of the defendants in this action.

[fol. 2147] The principal contentions advanced by defendants are: (1) that the Court may order disclosure of grand jury testimony where the interests of justice require, and that considerations of fairness and the liberal policy of the discovery rules require disclosure here; (2) that the government has no claim of privilege because the transcripts are in the possession and custody of the Court; (3) that the defendants are at least entitled to the testimony of those witnesses who will consent to disclosure, since at most only the witness' privilege is involved; and (4) that disclosure of testimony would be consistent with the procedure under which documents obtained by the government in connection with the grand jury are being made available to the defendants.

The government asks that defendants' motions be denied on the grounds that (1) disclosure of any part of grand jury proceedings is contrary to public policy and is uniformly denied except under unusual circumstances, not present here, where the veil of secrecy must be lifted in the exercise of the courts' supervisory responsibility over the administration of justice; (2) the defendants are unable to justify the breach of grand jury secrecy in this case; indeed, the need for continuing secrecy is even stronger in the enforcement of the antitrust laws, where the grand jury must of necessity call upon employees and business associates of prospective defendants for testimony; (3) transcripts of testimony are in the possession and custody of the Attorney General, are not in this civil action subject to disclosure under the Rules of Criminal Procedure, and, by virtue of the privilege accorded them by public policy, are beyond the reach of discovery process under the Rules of Civil Procedure; and (4) Lever's demand for the names of grand jury witnesses lacks substance in the face of the knowledge admitted by other defendants, and is barred by privilege.

[fol. 2148] In the interest of brevity we shall make only limited reference in this brief to the arguments and authorities set forth in the government's brief filed on November 3, 1954 in opposition to Procter's motion for production of grand jury transcripts, and in the government's answer filed on November 9, 1955 in opposition to Procter's objections to the taking of the deposition of Mr. Siddall. The government's position was also referred to in its brief filed on October 28, 1955 in support of its motion to compel answers.

Question Presented

May the defendants in a civil action secure transcripts of grand jury testimony for discovery purposes?

Argument

I

Disclosure of grand jury transcripts is contrary to established public policy.

Unlike many another hoary "rule" less solidly imbedded in public policy, the rule of grand jury secrecy has not been eroded by exceptions, but, thanks to the firm protection of the courts, stands today as a stout barrier to invasion of the traditional privacy of the grand jury system. To be sure, the courts in the exercise of their supervisory powers over the functioning of the grand jury system upon rare occasions have been constrained to lift the veil of secrecy in isolated cases, as noted in the government's brief filed on November 3, 1954, in opposition to Procter's motion. But, as observed by the Court of Appeals for this Circuit in United States v. Rose, 215 F. 2d 617, 629 (C.A. 3, 1954), these instances represent not the rule, but rather exceptions to the rule.

Apart from cases involving irregularities in the grand jury proceedings, which concededly are not in point here, [fol. 2149] disclosure of grand jury testimony to defendants has been allowed only in cases where the defendants are charged with perjury before the grand jury. Even there, the defendants have been permitted access solely to their own testimony. United States v. Rose, supra; United States v. Remington, 191 F. 2d 246 (C.A. 2, 1951), cert. den. 343 U.S. 907, 72 S. Ct. 580 (1952); United States v. White, 104 F. Supp. 120 (D.C. N.J. 1952). The extremely narrow range of circumstances in which the courts have been willing even to consider lifting the veil of secrecy is shown by the cases cited by defendants. The inapplicability of such cases here is shown in the government's brief filed on November 3, 1954, pp. 6-9.

The defendants also call attention to Herzog v. United States, 75 S. Ct. 349 (1955). There, after referring to United States v. Alper, 156 F. 2d 222 (C.A. 2, 1946), discussed in the government's brief filed November 3, 1954, page 9, Mr. Justice Douglas, sitting as a Circuit Justice, found that there was a "substantial" question whether a trial court should inspect a witness' testimony before a grand jury to see if the witness had impeached himself. The question presented here, whether the defendants are entitled to inspect the grand jury transcript in advance of trial for discovery purposes, was not in issue, nor was any suggestion made as to how this question should be determined.

It is urged, nevertheless, that many of the cases denying defendants access to grand jury transcripts are based upon an erroneous and uncritical application of Judge Learned Hand's vigorous statement against disclosure in United States v. Garsson, et al., 291 Fed. 646, 649 (S.D. N.Y., 1923) (Colgate memorandum, p. 35; Lever brief, p. 13). The defendants contend that Judge Hand's concurrence in the [fol. 2150] Alper ruling represents some relaxation of his statement in Garsson. The same argument was made to Judge Medina in United States v. Henry S. Morgan, et al., Civil Action No. 43-757, S.D. N.Y., filed October 30, 1947, in support of the claim:

... that it rests in your Honor's discretion whether it [the veil of secrecy] should be lifted in a discovery proceeding in a case of this immense scope where the plaintiff has the advantage of accumulating the material for many years.

To this Judge Medina replied:

I don't think that is any modification of Judge Learned Hand's views. (Transcripts of Hearing, December 8, 1948, pp. 279, 280, attached to Government's Brief of November 3, 1954.)

The cases referred to above involve the question of when and under what circumstances the courts should lift the veil of secrecy in the exercise of their supervisory responsibilities over the grand jury and in the administration of criminal justice. However, the instant motions do not properly involve this Court's supervisory responsibilities under the Criminal Rules, despite Colgate's express effort to invoke the discretion of the Court under Rule 6 (c). It is clear that the defendants here are seeking the grand jury transcripts solely for discovery purposes.

Notwithstanding the relative novelty of this extraordinary claim, the precise question presented here has been squarely raised before other courts. In two cases factually [fol. 2151] indistinguishable from the present case the courts ruled squarely that the argument for disclosure, no matter how liberally the purpose of civil discovery may be viewed, cannot justify endangering the grand jury system. In United States v. General Motors Corporation, 15 F.R.D. 486 (D. Del. 1954), Judge Leahy apparently considered the rule of secrecy as having even greater force in civil cases, when he said:

Even in a criminal case, only extraordinary circumstances ever prompt a court to exercise a discretionary power to disclose. (p. 486)

In his carefully reasoned opinion Judge Leahy refutes the claimed need of defendants for the transcripts in a civil case; and shows that a precedent for disclosure "would tend to restrict the free function of the grand jury." (p. 487). This ruling is directly in point here, and the opinion offers persuasive reasons why the transcripts should not be disclosed.

In United States v. Henry S. Morgan, et al., Civil Action No. 43-757, S.D. N.Y., filed October 30, 1947, Judge Medina was confronted with the same request made here. His views against disclosure of grand jury transcripts in a civil antitrust case were so strong that he considered the matter unarguable, and when counsel urged that the veil of secrecy might safely be lifted in appropriate cases, replied:

You see this veil of secrecy being lifted is one thing, but giving the defendants in an antitrust suit the copy of the grand jury minutes is a little different.

(Transcript of Hearing Before Judge Medina, December 8, 1948, p. 279, attached to Government's Brief of November 3, 1954)

Against these persuasive rejections of the precise claim made here, defendants can cite only the statement by Judge Carter, in United States v. Standard Oil Company of California, et al., Civil Action No. 11584-C, S.D. Calif., C. Div., filed May 12, 1950, Pre-Trial Memorandum No. 1, [fol. 2152] July 6, 1955, that no harm could come in that case from supplying the names of grand jury witnesses, and his proposal that the government supply the transcripts of testimony given by witnesses who would consent to disclosure. The memorandum in which this extraordinary proposal is put forward does not undertake to discuss the considerations which other courts have uniformly held an absolute bar to disclosure. As will be shown below, the possible consent of the witness is no justification for disclosure and the concomitant danger to the grand jury system.

Disclosure upon consent of the witness was recently urged in United States v. Darling, Civil Action No. 52-C-1716, E.D. Mich., So. Div., in an application made by the witnesses themselves for production of the transcripts of their testimony. One of the applicants was himself a defendant, and the others asserted the likelihood that they would be called as witnesses upon the trial of the civil action. In an order entered October 31, 1955, Judge Lederle found that the court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, to which the civil case had been removed, was the proper court to decide the question. When the application was thereafter renewed before the latter court, Judge Perry stated at an unreported meeting of counsel held on November 18, 1955 for the purpose of setting a date for hearing, that he wished to inform counsel for the applicants immediately, after reading their brief, that he was going to overrule the motion.

The defendants here attempt to distinguish the General Motors and Morgan cases by indulging in completely unwarranted speculation in which it is implied, if not directly charged, that the government has employed the grand jury here for discovery purposes in preparation for this civil action, as a substitute for the discovery afforded by the civil rules. We submit that there is no justification for speculation of this kind, and question whether the defendants are not attempting to raise anew the charge of improper use of the grand jury process which this Court rejected in denying, on January 14, 1954, Procter's motion to suppress documents secured by grand jury subpoena. Any effort to secure grand jury transcripts on this ground would run directly counter to the unanimous refusal of the courts to permit impeachment of grand jury proceedings.

II

Disclosure of grand jury testimony cannot be justified by civil discovery purposes.

The sole issue presented here is whether the defendants in this civil action may obtain the grand jury transcripts for discovery purposes. We have already referred to the opinion in the General Motors case, supra, in which Judge Leahy held that disclosure could not be justified for purposes of discovery in a subsequent civil action. Examination of the reasons commonly given for maintaining secrecy demonstrates that they outweigh any claim of need which may be based on discovery grounds.

Whatever the scope of a grand jury witness' privilege against being compelled to disclose his testimony as evidence in a subsequent proceeding (Colgate, pp. 8-10; Lever, pp. 14-16), the issue here is clearly not concerned with that right. The witnesses before the grand jury do not alone have an interest in the disclosure or the non-disclosure of their testimony.

The public, and the government acting in the public interest, are concerned with the preservation of secrecy of grand jury proceedings for four reasons which persist even though the grand jury has been discharged. As summarized in United States v. Rose, supra, these reasons are as follows:

[fol. 2154] . . . (2) to insure the utmost freedom to the grand jury in its deliberations, and to prevent persons subject to indictment or their friends from importuning the grand jurors; (3) to prevent subornation of perjury or tampering with the witnesses who may testify before the grand jury and later appear at the trial of those indicted by it; (4) to encourage free and untrammelled disclosures by persons who have information with respect to the commission of crimes; (5) to protect innocent accused who is exonerated from disclosure of the fact that he has been under investigation, and from the expense of standing trial where there was no probability of guilt. (215 F. 2d. at p. 628).

Because the issues in this case involve conduct which may also form the basis of criminal charges under Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, the application to antitrust cases of the four reasons quoted above from United States v. Rose is readily apparent. We do not consider it necessary to stress here reason (3), the danger of subornation of perjury or tampering with the witnesses who have testified before the grand jury, but we note the danger in a precedent which would be applied in other cases and to other defendants.

As to consideration (2), defendants argue that release of the grand jury transcript would not expose the deliberations of the grand jury. But it is inescapable that the release of the testimony presented to the grand jury would expose the basis of its deliberations and might lead to criticism and challenge of its actions.

The suggestion that there can be no harm in disclosing the testimony of those witnesses who will consent ignores the fact that any privilege the witness may have arises out of the state's interest in preserving the integrity of the grand jury system, which is paramount to the interest of any individual witness, or any single investigation. The defendants' employees and those who do business with them might well be coerced into disclosure of matters thought to have been given in strictest confidence, rather than invite the defendants' displeasure. To sanction such a course would give notice to every witness hereafter in a grand jury proceeding that some day in the future he too may be [fol. 2155] confronted with this difficult choice, and would seriously endanger safeguards erected over the centuries to assure that grand jury witnesses "feel free to speak the truth without reserve." Goodman v. United States, 108 F. 2d 516, 519 (C.A. 9, 1939).

Defendants have studiously ignored in their briefs the effect that fear of disclosure of the testimony of a witness would have upon the willingness of the witness to testify freely before the grand jury. This consideration goes directly to protection of the investigative function of the grand jury itself, so as to assure to that body testimony given by witnesses who are free from fear of reprisals occasioned by the baring of their testimony. As shown in Goodman v. United States, supra, freedom from just this fear has been held to be essential to grand jury investigation of violations of the antitrust laws. This reason for protecting the grand jury given in the Goodman case is even more forceful today when Rule 6(e) (Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure) has removed the requirement previously in effect in some districts that the witness be sworn to secrecy.

It is not enough to say that the consent of those who testified shall automatically operate to release to public scrutiny their testimony. Most, if not all, of these witnesses, are agents or employees of the defendants, or are engaged in some aspect of the soap industry and thus may be susceptible to pressure by these powerful defendants. They may not, therefore, be in a position to deny consent. In a sense such witnesses must be protected against themselves, if in future investigations grand juries are to obtain "free and untrammelled disclosures."

As to consideration (5), the fact that a grand jury investigation results in the filing of a suit against only a few persons or firms does not warrant the conclusion that the [fol. 2156] investigation was directed only at the persons finally named as defendants. The grand jury may have investigated the possibility of criminal conduct by others who, on the basis of all the testimony presented, appear to be innocent of any wrongdoing. Yet the activities of such innocent persons may be pictured in a most unfavorable light unless all the transcripts of grand jury testimony are revealed. These innocent persons may, therefore, be compelled to consent, as the lesser of two evils, to the revelation of their testimony, or the testimony of their employees, and thus be deprived of the protection of grand jury secrecy.

The fact that the government has previously consented to an order permitting the defendants to inspect and copy documents in its possession, including some which were first subpoenaed by the grand jury, is not a precedent for the revelation of grand jury testimony. These documents are in the possession of the government by consent of the owners and not pursuant to any grand jury process. Moreover, there is a vital distinction between documentary and testimonial disclosure. The documents existed prior to the calling of the grand jury. As Judge Medina said in distinguishing documents from testimony, in the Morgan case, supra, "they [documents] do not gain immunity by being shown to the grand jury." (p. 276 of colloquy appended to the government's brief in opposition to Procter's motion to disclose the grand jury transcripts, filed November 3, 1954.) Testimony taken by the grand jury, on the other hand, is quite another thing. It has no existence, as it were, other than before the grand jury, and it is by this very nature immune.

Against these compelling considerations for maintaining the privacy of the grand jury room defendants advance only three reasons in favor of disclosure: (1) that it is unfair [fol. 2157] to deny them access to material to which the government has had access; (2) that the grand jury transcripts would aid them in their preparation for trial; and (3) that some witnesses may forget their grand jury testimony and be charged at the trial with making inconsistent statements.

Even if taken at full value these contentions would not justify disclosure. As Judge Leahy said in his opinion in the General Motors case, supra, discovery "must be halted when it attempts to invade ground reserved for loftier reasons than thoroughness of preparing one's case on the civil side of the court" (pp. 486-487). In rejecting the discovery claim made there the Court disposed of the principal contentions urged by the defendants here:

It is argued the Department of Justice will have the transcripts of the Grand Jury available and may use them, and such, it is suggested, will be a tactical advantage the discovery rules were designed to eliminate. But defendant here, has other discovery techniques at its disposal through which most of the information sought and clues to other possible sources may be obtained. . . . If a precedent is set that evidence before a grand jury may at some future time be disclosed to the probing examination of civil litigants in preparation of the trial of their cause not alone in a collateral matter but, as in the case at bar, in directly related matters where the inquisitorial examination of the grand jury and a civil litigant's discovery in preparation for trial encompass the same subject matter and include an identity of events, such precedent would tend to restrict the free function of the grand jury. (pp. 487-488)

Here the defendants concede that they have long been aware of the identity of most if not all of the witnesses who testified before the grand jury, and that they could discover the identity of any others (Colgate brief, p. 11; Lever brief, p. 7; Procter motion, p. 2). Undoubtedly, in view of the description of witnesses set forth in Colgate's brief, p. 2, they have already had access to these sources of information, and they may freely question those who have knowledge of relevant facts, short of using the process [fol. 2158] of the court to compel disclosure of what was said in the privacy of the grand jury room.

Moreover, the defendants for several months have had statements of the issues in this case, as the government sees them, and have had an opportunity to question the government in detail about them. The alleged fact that some of these witnesses may no longer recall the precise language they used before the grand jury does not, in these circumstances, unfairly prejudice the defendants. The defendants have no right nor any need to know the precise grand jury testimony of these witnesses. Such testimony is for present purposes completely irrelevant and immaterial to any issue in this litigation. What may be relevant and material here is the knowledge of any such witnesses of facts pertinent to this case, and such information could be readily obtained from them. In an analogous situation, where defendants sought to inspect and copy answers given by former dealers to a government questionnaire, the court rejected may of the contentions made here, saying:

... It is the statements made by these individuals under the circumstances indicated which the defendants now seek to inspect and copy. It is these statements as such which are privileged. (United States v. Deere & Co., 9 F.R.D. 523, 527 (D. Minn., 1949))

The assertion that to avail themselves of their right under the Federal Rules to discover information relevant to this case by taking depositions would be expensive and time consuming certainly does not provide a basis for invading the traditional privacy of the grand jury. The mere fact that the grand jury and attorneys from the Department of Justice may already have covered some of the same ground, at considerable expense of time and money, is no reason for turning over to the defendants the product of that effort where the defendants have equal opportunity and ample means to discover the same facts. Even in the absence of [fol. 2159] such considerations of public policy as are involved here, in United States v. United Shoe Machinery Corporation, 76 F. Supp. 315, 317 (D. Mass. 1948), Judge Wyzanski refused to order the production for the government of defendants' copies of its patents which the defendant had organized in a certain fashion.

Moreover, the release of the grand jury transcript would not, in all probability, diminish or eliminate the desires of defense counsel to take extensive depositions of these same witnesses, as suggested by Lever in its brief, p. 22, and by Colgate in its brief, pp. 11-12. Indeed, counsel for Procter assert that in the grand jury proceedings, witnesses were examined under oath "without notice to Procter, without opportunity by Procter to procure protective orders, without opportunity to explain or clarify by cross-examination." (Procter brief, September 24, 1954, p. 5.) Colgate makes a similar assertion in its brief, p. 11. These contentions suggest that rather than reduce deposition-taking, disclosure of the transcript to counsel for the defendants would inspire lengthy and extensive depositions of grand jury witnesses by them to "explain or clarify" the testimony. But such explanations or clarifications are clearly only necessary or appropriate if, as and when such testimony is educed at the trial.

As noted above, discovery under even the most liberal construction of the rules is not without its limits. Even where a formal claim of privilege will not lie, material less carefully guarded than grand jury testimony may not be had merely for the asking. As the Supreme Court said in Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U. S. 495 (1947):

... Petitioner has made more than an ordinary request for relevant, non-privileged facts in the possession of his adversaries or their counsel. He has sought discovery as of right of oral and written statements of witnesses whose identity is well known and whose availability to petitioner appears unimpaired.

[fol. 2160] We are thus dealing with an attempt to secure the production of written statements and mental impressions contained in the files and the mind of the attorney Fortenbaugh without any showing of necessity or any indication or claim that denial of such production would unduly prejudice the preparation of petitioner's case or cause him any hardship or injustice. For aught that appears, the essence of what petitioner seeks either has been revealed to him already through the interrogatories or is readily available to him direct from the witnesses for the asking.

In our opinion, neither Rule 26 nor any other rule dealing with discovery contemplates production under such circumstances. That is not because the subject matter is privileged or irrelevant, as those concepts are used in these rules. Here is simply an attempt, without purported necessity or justification, to secure written statements, private memoranda and personal recollections prepared or formed by an adverse party's counsel in the course of his legal duties. As such, it falls outside the arena of discovery and contravenes the public policy underlying the orderly prosecution and defense of legal claims. Not even the most liberal of discovery theories can justify unwarranted inquiries into the files and the mental impressions of an attorney. (pp. 508-510)

III

Transcripts of grand jury testimony are protected against production by the exception accorded privileged documents under Rule 34.

A. Defendants' motions are governed by Rule 34.

Although none of the defendants expressly predicates its motion upon Rule 34 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, it is clear that their motions are governed by this rule, since it is the one which authorizes the courts to require the production of documents in civil actions, and imposes limits upon the scope of the production which may be directed. Hickman v. Taylor, supra. Rule 34 expressly qualifies the production which may be ordered by confining it to documents "not privileged." If, therefore, the transcripts of grand jury testimony which are in the possession and custody of the Attorney General are to be regarded as privileged within the meaning of Rule 34, their production may [fol. 2161] not be required under civil discovery. This is in effect conceded in Colgate's brief (p. 21).

Perhaps in recognition of the force of this argument, Colgate has chosen to found its motion on Rule 6 (e) of the Rules of Criminal Procedure. However, under the applicability provisions of the Rules of Criminal Procedure (Rules 1, 2 and 54), Rule 6 (e) pertains only to criminal proceedings. We do not concede that in a criminal action any different result would be reached under Rule 6 (e) than in a civil action under Rule 34, because the decisions governing disclosure in criminal proceedings impose an almost absolute secrecy, subject only to the limited exception discussed above. The distinction is important, however, because the discretion recognized by Rule 6 (e) is based upon the court's responsibilities for supervision of the grand jury and for the protection of the rights of those accused in criminal actions, whereas these responsibilities are not involved in an application for civil discovery purposes, and there is no occasion for the exercise of discretion, once the privileged character of the transcripts is recognized. The considerations pertinent to the exercise of the Court's discretion under Rule 6 (e) are not present here and there is neither justification nor utility in examining Colgate's claim under Rule 6 (e).

B. Transcripts of grand jury testimony are within the possession and custody of the Attorney General.

Contrary to the defendants' contentions, transcripts of grand jury testimony are made at the instance of the government as an aid to the attorneys charged by the Attorney General with the duty of conducting grand jury investigations and are in the possession and custody of the Attorney General. The propriety of making such transcripts, and of their use and retention by government counsel was noted in United States v. Amazon Industrial Chemical Corporation, et al., 55 F. 2d 254 (D. Md. 1931). In 1933 the Congress expressly authorized the taking of stenographic transcripts of testimony to assist counsel for the [fol. 2162] government, and on behalf of the United States:

... the attendance before the grand jury during the taking of testimony of one or more clerks or stenographers employed in a clerical capacity to assist the district attorney or other counsel for the government who shall, in that connection, be deemed to be persons acting for and on behalf of the United States in an official capacity and function. (Act of May 18, 1933, 48 Stat. 58, amending Section 1025 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (18 U.S.C., Sec. 556). Cf. United States v. Weathers, 21 F. Supp. 763 (N.D. Ga., 1937))

This law was continued in effect by the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Notes of Advisory Committee on Rules, Note to Subdivision (d) of Rule 6, 18 U.S.C., Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, Rule 6, p. 2527.

The transcripts of testimony taken by stenographers thus employed under the authority of the Attorney General and paid for from the appropriation of the Department of Justice are not records kept by or under the control of the grand jury. Unlike such grand jury records as the minute book of attendance and voting kept by the grand jury, transcripts of testimony are never in the possession or custody of the grand jury or of the clerk of the court. They belong to the Department of Justice and are kept pursuant to the authority conferred on the Attorney General by 5 U.S.C., Section 22, to prescribe regulations for the custody and use of departmental records, papers and property.

It follows that, contrary to the contention made by Colgate, the grand jury transcripts are in the possession and custody of the Department of Justice rather than in the possession and custody of the Court. They are, therefore, subject to a claim by the Department of privilege against production under Rule 34.

[fol. 2163] C. Transcripts of grand jury testimony are privileged against production under Rule 34.

By virtue of the secrecy surrounding grand jury proceedings, and the express prohibition in Rule 6(e) against disclosure, grand jury transcripts are regarded by the Department of Justice as highly confidential records. This view as to the confidential character of such transcripts has long been shared by the courts, as stated in Goodman v. United States, supra:

... Through their participation in the proceedings both grand jurors and witnesses occupy a special relationship to the state; and for reasons grounded in public policy, as we have seen, the testimony taken in these proceedings is privileged and confidential. Considerations of mere convenience or even of downright hardship on the part of the witness do not outweigh the policy of secrecy in respect of grand jury investigations. (p. 520)

We do not rest the government's claim of privilege upon the narrow ground that transcripts of grand jury testimony are the work product of government attorneys. To be sure, there is no essential difference between notes taken by an attorney for the United States and notes taken by a stenographer employed for the express purpose of assisting counsel for the government by making a verbatim report of questions and answers "for and on behalf of the United States," and the essential element of the work product privilege, as stated in Scourtes v. Fred W. Albrecht Grocery Co., 15 F.R.D. 55, 58 (N.D. Ohio, E.D., 1953), " . . . that the legal talent and training of the attorney has been exercised in initiating and directing the investigation," is obviously present. There is also a clear analogy to the situation in United States v. Deere & Co., supra, where it was held that answers to questionnaires submitted by government attorneys to former dealers of the defendant manufacturers were privileged against production under Rule 34. The decision in that case, however, recognized that the claim of privilege in an antitrust proceeding brought by the government rests upon public policy:

[fol. 2164] There is no doubt that this rule [informant's privilege] would not apply to many cases involving the Government where the latter seeks to protect no public interest as such. Actions under the Anti-Trust Acts, however, are clearly actions based upon the public interest. This is apparent from the very nature of the laws. For they are designed to protect the commerce of the Nation, and their violation in many instances constitutes criminal activity. Although the instant action is not a criminal action, the basis of the privilege is one of public policy for protection of the public interest, not the criminal nature of the case. It is not for the protection of any person. The considerations which require the withholding of information and its source from the accused by the Government in criminal cases are present also in civil anti-trust actions brought for the public interest by the Government. Without the anti-trust laws and resulting actions to enforce them, monopoly would strangle competition and threaten the Nation's economic well-being. (p. 526)

It is clear that the case for acceding transcripts of grand jury testimony the status of privileged documents invokes loftier considerations than a mere proprietary interest in the work of an attorney. Ordinarily an attorney is free to reveal his work as he sees fit, subject only to his obligations to his client; in the case of transcripts of grand jury testimony, however, counsel for the government are bound by a fundamental public policy directed toward the protection of the grand jury system itself. Even though Rule 6 (e) of the Rules of Criminal Procedure is not applicable in a civil action, the restraint which it imposes, and the repeated admonitions of the courts concerning the need for secrecy, require that transcripts of testimony be shielded by a privilege based solidly upon public policy. And where public policy requires secrecy, discovery is barred. Thus, in Castellano v. Pennsylvania-Reading Seashore Lines, 15 F.R.D. 276 (E.D. Pa., 1953) reports required to be submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission under the limitation that they should not be used for any purpose in any suit for damages were shielded from discovery by public policy.

Disclosure of documents of a confidential character belonging to the Department of Justice is forbidden, pur-[fol. 2165] suant to statute, supra, by Department Order No. 3464, Supplement No. 4 (revised January 13, 1953), which provides, in pertinent part:

... Specific authority is hereby given to each and every attorney in the Department of Justice now or hereafter in charge of any Government litigation, ... to reveal and furnish to an actual or prospective witness, a grand jury, opposing counsel or a court, either during or preparatory to a judicial proceeding ... such material and relevant documents or information as such attorney shall deem necessary or desirable to the discharge of his professional and official duties; provided, however, that no such attorney shall reveal or furnish any of such documents or information when by so doing, in his opinion, injury might be done to the public interest and shall not disclose the name or identity of any confidential informant or make available for any purpose to anyone outside the Department of Justice any investigative report of the Department or any copy thereof without express prior approval by the Attorney General.

This Departmental regulation has the force of law. Ex parte Sackett, 74 F.2d 922 (C.A. 9, 1935). See also Ex rel Bayarsky v. Brooks, 51 F. Supp. 974 (D. N.J., 1943). In the Sackett case the court said:

In view of the fact that under these regulations the documents, although physically in possession of the witness, are in law in the custody of the Attorney General and he is prohibited from producing them by the lawful rule of the Department, the court had no power or authority to compel him to do so. (p. 924)

The preclusive force of similar regulations prohibiting production of governmental documents where public policy is involved has long been recognized. Boske v. Comingore, 177 U.S. 459, 469, 470. Cf. In re Appeal of S.E.C. ex rel. Timbers, C.A. 6, memo opinion, decided October 19, 1955. And in United States v. Reynolds, 345 U. S. 1 (1953), in discussing the privilege against disclosure of government documents the Supreme Court made this significant observation:

In each case, the showing of necessity which is made will determine how far the court should probe in satisfying itself that the occasion for invoking the privilege is appropriate. . . . Here, necessity was greatly minimized by an available alternative, which might have given respondents the evidence to make out their case without forcing a showdown on the claim of [fol. 2166] privilege. By their failure to pursue that alternative, respondents have posed the privilege question for decision with the formal claim of privilege set against a dubious showing of necessity. (p. 11)

The identity of grand jury witnesses is privileged.

In connection with its motion for access to the grand jury transcript of testimony, Lever separately demands that the government be ordered to name the witnesses who appeared before the grand jury. (Lever motion, par. A.) Procter suggests this course as an alternative in its brief dated November 28, 1955; although in its motion, dated September 24, 1954, Procter states (par. c, p. 2) that "the names of most if not all of those who appeared and testified before the said Grand Jury . . . have been known for many months."

Without pressing the point that the defendants' concessions render their application substantially if not completely moot, we note that this demand also seeks to infringe upon the privileged sanctity of the grand jury, and should therefore be rejected. The government does not deny the right of the defendants to seek information in accordance with the discovery provisions of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, including the identity of persons having knowledge of relevant facts. But this demand, like the defendant's motions for access to grand jury transcripts, is not grounded on any specified right of discovery accorded by the Rules of Civil Procedure, and for an obvious reason. Under the Federal Rules, a party may inquire only into matters not privileged (Rules 33, 26 (b)). Hickman v. Taylor, supra. The attempt here is to obtain information of the type usually sought by way of interrogatories, but to circumvent the privilege limitation of Rule 33 by moving without reference to the Rules. This does not, however, [fol. 2167] alter the essential character of the demand, nor escape the limitations imposed by the Rules. As the Supreme Court stated in Hickman v. Taylor, supra, at p. 505:

... The fact that the petitioner may have used the wrong method does not destroy the main thrust of his attempt.

The government submits that the identity of grand jury witnesses is privileged information, falling within the cloak of privacy drawn around the grand jury by public policy. The considerations set forth above as grounds for denying access to the grand jury room are also applicable to shield the identity of witnesses. Such disclosure would open the door to the very pressures against which witnesses must be protected in the interest of preserving the free function of the grand jury.

Further, there is a complete absence of any showing of cause for the disclosure sought. There is no showing that the defendants can not ascertain the identity of persons having knowledge of relevant facts without infringing upon the secrecy of the grand jury. The degree of cause shown here fails even to reach the threshold over which such a question must pass in the view of the Supreme Court as stated in the Reynolds case, supra.

DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY

Civil Action No. 1196-52

[Title omitted]

SUPPLEMENTAL MEMORANDUM ON BEHALF OF THE PROCTER &
GAMBLE COMPANY IN SUPPORT OF MOTION FOR ACCESS TO GRAND JURY TRANSCRIPTS*—December 22, 1955

Preliminarily, we submit that plaintiff should be required to answer questions 1 (a), (b) and (c) propounded by the Court in its memorandum dated December 9, 1955 in order that the Court may have all facts relating to the use of the grand jury proceedings. However, even with these questions unanswered, we submit that the circumstances before the Court show clearly that, under the general principles [fol. 2169] stated by the Court on December 12th, the grand jury transcripts should be disclosed.

Admittedly, one purpose of the grand jury proceeding was to use the information obtained therein in deciding on and preparing for a civil action. (See this Court's opinion of May 11, 1953, p. 4-5, 14 F.R.D. 230, 233; plaintiff's affidavit of March 21, 1953, p. 1; Department of Justice press release of December 11, 1952.) We believe that it was the sole purpose and certainly that was true in the later grand jury stages when much of the testimony was taken.

Also admittedly, the grand jury transcript was taken to Washington and has remained there during the institution and the entire preparation of the civil case. Nor will it be denied that the grand jury proceeding was in fact used for civil purposes—so used in many ways:

(a) The civil complaint, filed sixteen days after the grand jury, was necessarily based in large part, if not entirely, on the grand jury documents and testimony.

*We do not propose to discuss herein the Lever request for a list of grand jury witnesses but we reserve the right to file a similar motion at a later date.

(b) Many of plaintiff's tentative statements of issues, for example alleged oral conversations, must have been based on grand jury information.

(c) The grand jury transcript has certainly been used by plaintiff in answering or not answering questions propounded by defendants pursuant to the direction of the Court. In fact, on at least one occasion, on November 12, [fol. 2170] 1954, plaintiff's counsel in refusing to answer a question said that if defendants had the grand jury transcript, they would know the answer to the question.

(d) It is most evident that the grand jury information has been at least the principal source from which the plaintiff up to this time has determined the factual and evidentiary scope of the case.

(e) The same is the case with plaintiff's determination of prospective witnesses and the subject of their testimony.

(f) While those parts of the grand jury transcript which are favorable to the defendants will not be actually used by plaintiff affirmatively, yet plaintiff has had the benefit of these matters in framing its case. These very parts may be of the greatest value to the defendants.

• These various uses by the plaintiff of the grand jury information also demonstrates its value to the defendants.

The Government has had access to this evidence for a period of more than three years, during which it has utilized it as described above. The defendants need it for the preparation of their defenses. This need is greater because the complaint and the issues and plaintiff's answers [fol. 2171] to the questions propounded by the defendants under Your Honor's suggestion are all so vague. Defendants cannot be on an informational parity with the plaintiff in the preparation of this case without having these transcripts.

Furthermore, defendants' access to these transcripts would greatly expedite the preparatory and pretrial proceedings in this case. The grand jury product is the nub of this case. The sooner it is known to both parties, the sooner we can stop meandering around the penumbra of this case, and the more rapidly we can bring it to final issue and to trial.

A suggestion that defendants can obtain such information by deposition of the grand jury witnesses is without merit. In the light of the broad scope of this case, it would be manifestly impossible, after three or four years, to reconstruct now evidence given at a time much nearer to the actual event. See Thomas v. Pennsylvania R. Co., E.D.N.Y., 7 F.R.D. 610, 611; Newell v. Capital Transit Co., 7 F.R.D. 732, 734.

Plaintiff suggests that access to the transcripts would also require depositions. But these depositions would necessarily be shorter than if we had not received some of the desired information from the grand jury proceedings. Despite plaintiff's apparent contention otherwise, the part is still smaller than the whole.

[fol. 2172] We will mention only a couple of plaintiff's contentions, as they have already been dealt with in the briefs and oral argument.

(1) Plaintiff contends that disclosure, even if consented to, would exert pressure on the present grand jury witnesses and future ones. Plaintiff seems to forget that no grand jury witness can ever be assured that his testimony will not in the future be disclosed. This is because of Criminal Rule 6(e) as well as because of the established common law principle that such disclosure will be made where the ends of justice require. Plaintiff also overlooks the fact, mentioned by Wigmore, that assurance of permanent non-disclosure would encourage false testimony before the grand jury. And, incidentally, who is the plaintiff to talk about pressure when the plaintiff has—and the grand jury witnesses know the plaintiff has—in its back pocket for its own private use years-old and complicated testimony which presents a problem of memory and of change in conditions.

(2) The plaintiff seeks to draw an analogy from informer's cases. We submit they are totally inapplicable to the question before us.

(a) Informer's statements are documents of the Justice Department, a part of the Executive Branch. Grand jury transcripts, though now in possession of the Justice Department, are documents of the grand jury, an arm of this Court, the Judicial Branch, and these documents, under [fol. 2173] common law and under Criminal Rule 6(e), are subject to the disposition of this Court (our Supplemental Brief p. 1-2).

Even if the informer's privilege were to some extent analogous, the privilege is so circumscribed and limited by the courts as to be of no benefit to plaintiff. In fact, the privilege, as interpreted, is, if anything, helpful as an analogy to defendants.

(b) The informer's privilege applies only to the identity of the informer and not to the contents of his statement, and where the identity is known, the privilege disappears. 8 Wigmore on Evidence [3d ed.] § 2374; United States v. Standard Oil of California, et al., No. 11584-C, S.D. Calif., Cent. Div., Pre-trial Memorandum No. 1, July 6, 1955, p. 3; Bowman Dairy Co. v. United States, 341 U. S. 214, 221; United States v. Shubert, S.D.N.Y., 11 F.R.D. 528, 533-4; Tobin v. Gibe, D. Del., 13 F.R.D. 16; Durkin v. Pet Milk Co., W.D. Ark., 14 F.R.D. 385, 390; A.L.I. Model Code of Evidence (1942), Rule 230, and Comment. In the instant case, the names of many—the plaintiff suggests the names of all—of the grand jury witnesses are known, and as to such witnesses there is no informer's privilege.

(c) As to any unknown grand jury witnesses, the informer's privilege could, at the most, apply to witnesses who offered their testimony pursuant to a promise that their identity would not be revealed. Such a promise could not properly have been given in this case, and there is [fol. 2174] nothing to indicate it was. Criminal Rule 6(e); United States v. Standard Oil of California, supra, p. 6.

(d) The informer's privilege would apply only to persons who report violations of the law. See Webster's Unabridged New International Dictionary (2d ed., 1951), p. 1276; United States v. Lorain Journal Co., N.D. Ohio, 10 F.R.D. 487, 488; United States v. Shubert, S.D.N.Y., F.R.D. 528, 536; United States v. Krulewitch, 2 Cir., 145 F. 2d 76, 78. There is no contention that there are any such persons in the instant case.

(e) If, however, plaintiff claims that some of the grand jury witnesses are true informers, those specific cases would have to be presented to and passed on by the Court. United States v. Standard Oil of California, supra.

For the above reasons, and the other reasons stated in the briefs and oral argument, plaintiff should be required to disclose to defendants the grand jury transcripts not only of the testimony of the consenting witnesses but also of the testimony of all the witnesses.

[fol. 2175] TESTIMONY OF MR. SIDDALL

Disclosure of the testimony given by Mr. Siddall before the grand jury is supported by considerations equally strong but more immediate than those requiring the disclosure of the testimony of other consenting witnesses; for Mr. Siddall is confronted with a present examination on subjects about which he testified before the grand jury years ago. These subjects, relating to many discovery requests, search for many documents and delivery of a substantial number thereof, are detailed and complicated. The circumstances, as Your Honor recognized at the oral argument, differ radically from the simple factual situation Your Honor had in mind in stating that a witness is supposed to tell the same story every time he testifies.

Even though Mr. Siddall is a man of high character and fine memory, it is impossible for him to remember the details of testimony given three and one-half years ago. Also to be taken into account are changed conditions and additional information during the intervening period.

It would be unfair to require him to testify without having before him his previous testimony. He should not be forced to run the natural risk of conflicts—apparent or real—in his testimony, or be put at the disadvantage of explanation, when all this could be avoided by reference [fol. 2176] to his previous testimony. This is particularly true because his original testimony, taken under legal process, was without benefit of clarifying cross examination and because such testimony has been in the possession of the Government for three and one-half years.

In fairness, the Government should not be given the option in a trial or a deposition (a) of using exclusively the grand jury transcript of a witness for impeachment purposes in the event the witnesses' new testimony were less favorable to the plaintiff than it wished, or (b) of remaining quiet if the new testimony of the witness were favorable to plaintiff. It should not be a case of "heads the Government wins, tails the witness loses".

Rejection of such inequities seems to be the theme running through recent cases: the Standard Oil of California case, the pending Grunstein case, and even in the Darling case. We again quote from the Rose case in the Third Circuit (215 F. 2d 617, 630):

"Since all the defendant desires is a transcript of his own testimony, the sanctity of that which transpired before the Grand Jury is hardly in question. In addition, such disclosure would not subvert any of the reasons traditionally given for the inviolability of Grand Jury proceedings."

The Siddall situation, involving an imminent deposition examination presents, of course, an immediate as well as a strong case for disclosure of grand jury testimony. Similar compelling reasons support defendants' request for [fol. 2177] access to the testimony of all witnesses who consent to disclosure. Furthermore, all the grand jury testimony is necessary to put defendants on a parity with plaintiff in the preparation of this case, and access to it should be granted the defendants for the several reasons stated herein and in our briefs and oral argument.

Addendum

We have just received a copy of the opinion, filed December 19, 1955, and the briefs, in United States v. Ben Grunstein & Sons Company, et al., D.N.J., Civil No. 888-51. Judge Hartshorne's decision, in that it grants access to the defendants of the grand jury transcripts of all witnesses who will testify, clearly supports access in this case to the grand jury testimony of Mr. Siddall, who has already testified and will again do so in this case.

The Grunstein case does not seem to cover either of the other two questions raised in the instant case. So far as appears, no request was made for transcripts of testimony of non-party witnesses who consent to disclosure.

Nor was any contention made or any facts adduced to the effect that the grand jury proceedings were used to [fols. 2178-2181] prepare a civil case, or that the complaint in the civil action and the statements of issues and answers to questions were based on grand jury information.

The full facts of the instant case, as contrasted with the Grunstein and other cases, particularly the continuous use by plaintiff in this case of the grand jury proceedings for civil purposes, present an ideal situation for clarification of the law on this important subject. Such clarification, we believe, would be of great benefit to the courts and the bar in connection with "Big Case" litigation.

IN SUPPORT OF ITS MOTION TO INSPECT AND COPY TESTIMONY
OF WITNESSES BEFORE GRAND JURY—December 30, 1955

Introductory Remarks

This supplemental memorandum is a brief statement of points relative to the pending motions with particular reference to the following developments:

1. United States v. Grunstein. Judge Hartshorne has filed his opinion in U. S. v. Grunstein, Civ. No. 888-51, granting disclosure to the defendants therein "of so much of the minutes of the . . . Grand Jury testimony as includes that of (1) the defendants, who represent that they will take the stand in their own defense, and of (2) any other witnesses before such Grand Jury, who will definitely take the stand at this trial, as soon as such fact definitely appears." Defendants' motion did not seek access to the testimony of persons who would not be called as witnesses. Judge Hartshorne nevertheless pointed out that defendants could examine such persons by deposition, and thereafter, if need arose, could apply to the Court for access to their Grand Jury testimony or for inspection thereof by the Court itself to ascertain whether it should in fairness be revealed to the defendants.

[fol. 2183] It will be noted that Judge Hartshorne's decision was rendered during the trial of a case involving a demand for damages under the False Claims Act, 31 U.S.C. §231 et seq. It was based upon considerations of fairness in light of the policy of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. The requested discovery was allowed even though the administrative considerations of the "Big Case" were not present and no question of pre-trial discovery was involved.

We hereinafter discuss the Grunstein opinion in detail.

2. Plaintiff's refusal to disclose. In the course of the argument on the Motions for disclosure of the transcripts of witness' testimony before the Grand Jury, the Court inquired whether the plaintiff objected to submitting an affidavit or statement showing the use that the plaintiff has made, and intends to make, of the Grand Jury transcripts in preparing for the trial of this case and in the trial itself. After consideration by the Department of Justice, counsel for the plaintiff has advised the Court that the Government declines to respond to the Court's inquiry. (McDowell's Letter to the Court, December 23, 1955).

This refusal by the executive branch of the Government to respond to the Court's inquiry is as pointless as it is distasteful. It merely underlines the fact that the Government has extensively used the transcript, and it demonstrates that they intend to use it in the future for preparation and to reserve all rights to make such use of it at trial as they may see fit.

We hereinafter discuss the Government's use of the Grand Jury transcript.

[fol. 2184]

Discussion

I. The Government's Use of the Grand Jury Testimony.

1. The Government has used the testimony to prepare the complaint. This is demonstrated by:

a. The Chronology, which shows that the elaborate complaint was obviously prepared while the Grand Jury was sitting.

The complaint was filed December 11, 1952, two weeks and two days after the Grand Jury completed its hearings. The Thanksgiving holidays intervened.

b. The Department of Justice's press release issued when the complaint herein was filed states that "The filing of the complaint results from a careful and thorough investigation of the industry, including extensive grand jury proceedings."

2. The Government deliberately used the Grand Jury as an instrument of discovery for purposes of its civil proceeding.—

a. Witnesses were called and testified before the Grand Jury shortly before its term expired. This indicates the probability that they were called solely for the purpose of obtaining discovery for civil purposes. For example: (1) Colgate official James A. Reilly (since deceased) testified on November 6, 1952, a little more than a month before the complaint was filed, and about 3 weeks before the Grand Jury was discharged. (2) Colgate's then president, E. H. Little, testified on November 18, 1952, about a week before the Grand Jury was discharged, and only a little over three weeks before the complaint was filed.

b. An affidavit of government counsel has stated that the Grand Jury investigation was for the purpose of investigating the facts and deciding whether proceedings should [fol. 2185] be instituted, either criminal or civil. (Smith affidavit, March 21, 1953).

c. This Court has found that the purpose of the grand jury proceeding was to investigate civil as well as criminal law violations (Opinion, May 11, 1955).

d. The use of grand jury proceedings for purposes of compelling production of data including the testimony of witnesses, for purposes of a civil antitrust proceeding is an established, acknowledged procedure of the Department of Justice. See statement of Hon. Stanley N. Barnes, May 12, 1955, and other sources cited in Colgate's memorandum, pp. 13-19.

3. The Government has used the testimony before the Grand Jury in the civil proceedings to date.

a. The transcript of the Grand Jury proceedings has been in the files of the Antitrust Division in Washington. It has been available to and used by attorneys, accountants, investigators and others connected with the preparation of this case for trial. (See Plaintiff's Brief, p. 17; Transcript, pp. 86-89).

b. The affidavit of Joseph E. McDowell sworn to August 20, 1954, justifies demands for documents in the present civil proceedings on the basis of "substantial information . . . already . . . furnished . . . in the course of the investigation . . . conducted by the Department of Justice prior to the institution of this action." This undoubtedly refers in part at least to testimony before the Grand Jury. See Colgate Memorandum, pp. 4-5.

c. The Tentative Statements of Issues heretofore supplied to the defendants by the plaintiff refer to alleged [fol. 2186] events, conversations and transactions undoubtedly taken from testimony before the Grand Jury. See, for example, Government's Answer to Lever Question No. 17 and Colgate Question No. 8 Re. Prices and Costs.

4. The Government intends to use the testimony before the Grand Jury in the future conduct of the case: viz., in the selection of witnesses; in the review of their testimony before the witnesses take the stand in preparing responses to interrogatories, trial briefs, etc. The Government raises doubt as to whether it will be allowed to use the transcript to refresh or impeach witnesses (McDowell, transcript of argument, p. 105); but whether it uses the transcript in this fashion or not, it will undoubtedly use it in the course of preparing witnesses to testify at the trial.

[fol. 2187] II. In view of this use of the grand jury testimony, reasons of fairness and good administration of the big case indicate that defendants should be furnished a copy.

1. The testimony before the Grand Jury is an essential source of information to defendants.

a. Colgate states that at least 28 witnesses testified before the Grand Jury (Colgate Memorandum p. 2).

b. This is a "conspiracy" case. The Government's Tentative Statement of Issues discloses that it intends to rely upon testimony as to alleged conversations. Presumably, this is based upon testimony before the Grand Jury.

c. Defendants are entitled to parity of information with the plaintiff. This is the policy of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. It also follows from the fact, as Judge Hartshorne pointed out, that the transcript of Grand Jury testimony is a "judicial" document. The Courts should not allow one party an advantage flowing from access to such a source, unless clear, countervailing policy considerations compel.

2. Depositions are not an adequate substitute.

a. At least one vital witness before the Grand Jury is deceased: James A. Reilly, then executive vice president of Colgate in charge of soap sales.

b. The only person connected with Lever who testified before the Grand Jury were separated from the company or resigned prior to their testimony and are not connected with Lever directly or indirectly. For the past 3 years they have been engaged in occupations or enterprises not connected with the soap business.

c. Colgate states that only 9 out of 28 Grand Jury witnesses known to it were officers or employees of the defendants at the time of their testimony. Ten were never connected with the defendants. Nine were apparently former officers or employees (a category which always raises possibilities of surprise, animus or the like).

d. All witnesses testified more than 3 years ago. Calling such witnesses to testify in depositions at this time, concerning the extremely complicated economic facts and business transactions here involved, would certainly be unsatisfactory as well as expensive, time-consuming and dilatory.

3. Administration of the "Big Case" requires that defendants have access to the testimony before the Grand Jury:

a. The plaintiff's past and prospective use of the testimony of witnesses before the Grand Jury makes it inevitable that unless defendants are apprised of this evidentiary material, their preparation will be inadequate. They will necessarily seek adjournments in the course of the trial because of surprise.

b. There is no adequate way for defendants to be advised of this material except by access to the testimony before the Grand Jury.

c. The actual trial will necessarily be delayed, disfigured and complicated by controversy as to the Grand Jury transcript. If the Government attempts to use it at trial for purposes of refreshing recollection, impeachment or admissions, controversy is inevitable. If the Government attempts to use it at trial for purposes of refreshing recollection, impeachment or admissions, controversy is inevitable. If the Government merely uses it to prepare witnesses in advance of their testimony, controversy will also result. In any event, the burden on the Court and the parties will be great (cf. the use on 90 occasions of Grand Jury testimony in Socony-Vacuum, 310 U.S. 150 (1940); cf. the practice by which the trial judge is burdened with the necessity of reading the transcript). In addition, the trial will not develop the facts with the clarity and completeness necessary for the Big Case.

d. The preparation of the case and the bringing of it to trial will be long delayed and its expense vastly increased. Defendants will be forced to take elaborate and numerous depositions at widely separated places throughout the nation. Each will require a great deal of time to suit the convenience of all counsel, to permit examination by all counsel and to explore the facts.

e. If the government intends to take depositions of witnesses who testified before the Grand Jury, these will be delayed and complicated (cf. the difficulties re Siddall's deposition).

f. Without complete mutuality of information and parity between the parties, there is little possibility of stipulation of facts. Fact stipulations are almost indispensable in the trial of the Big Case.

III. Judge Hartshorne's opinion in United States v. Grunstein is a practical application of the rule upon which defendants rely in the present case: that is, that were considerations of fairness and efficient administration show good cause for giving access to the testimony of witnesses before a grand jury, upon motion of defendants in a subsequent civil action after termination of the Grand Jury [fol. 2190] functions, the court will require that they be furnished with a copy.

We shall first analyze Judge Hartshorne's opinion, and then apply it to the special situation of the present case.

1. Judge Hartshorne's opinion sets forth the following conclusions:

a. The basic issue is to coordinate the full discovery policy of the Rules and the traditional policy as to secrecy of Grand Jury proceedings.

b. Disclosure of Grand Jury testimony is wholly proper after its functions are ended, "where the ends of justice require it".

c. "The ends of justice" clearly call for disclosure to defendants of what plaintiff knows of this testimony. The issue is how far the so-called policy of secrecy counter-weighs this.

d. The traditional policy of secrecy basically applies to deliberations and actions of the Grand Jurors, which are not here involved.

e. The reasons for secrecy in United States v. Rose, 215 F. 2d 617, 628 (3d Cir. 1954) do not apply. The third reason, to prevent witness-tampering, is academic. The Federal Rules involve complete disclosure on the theory that the danger of witness-tampering is not as great as the disadvantage of surprise. The fourth reason, to encourage free disclosures before the Grand Jury, should not shield a person who testifies at trial from disclosure of prior statements. The witness must tell the truth and the whole truth, including prior relevant statements. Any other rule would be an invitation to perjury or to partial disclosure.

[fol. 2191] f. The Grand Jury is an arm of the Court, not of the Government in its capacity as plaintiff. The Court "should treat the parties alike in their rights to relevant testimony."

g. As to persons who will not be called as witnesses at the trial [which was not included in the motion in Grunstein] there is no "necessity, as far as defendants here are concerned" for the production of their testimony. "This is because, if they are not called, then plaintiff Government has not taken unfair advantage of its knowledge of the nature of their Grand Jury testimony . . ." Defendants may obtain a list of witnesses from plaintiff and examine them personally or by deposition. If necessary, they may then apply to the Court for access to their testimony.

2. Judge Hartshorn's opinion, applied to the present case, supports the following conclusions:

(1) It squarely indicates that plaintiff should be ordered to furnish defendants a copy of the Grand Jury testimony of any witnesses who are to be called at the trial by either plaintiff or any defendant.

(2) It clearly indicates, although it does not directly hold, that plaintiff should be ordered to furnish defendants a copy of the Grand Jury testimony of any consenting witness before the Grand Jury. See the paragraph beginning "Considering the defendants themselves", and especially the last following: "To the extent the defendants desire their own testimony, the sanctity of that which transpired before the grand jury is hardly in question. In addition, such disclosure would not subvert any of the reasons traditionally given for the inviolability of grand jury proceedings." U.S. v. Rose, supra, at page 630." Similarly, to the extent that any witness consents, the sanctity of grand jury proceedings is not in question.

[fol. 2192] (3) The opinion indicates that the controlling criterion is whether access to the testimony is necessary so far as defendants are concerned: that where such "necessity" exists, the disclosure policy of the Rules overcomes the traditional policy of secrecy of grand jury proceedings properly understood. In Grunstein, the case was at an advanced trial stage where the defendants' need for portions of the transcript was limited to its use to counteract the intended use thereof by the Government plaintiff to refresh memory. See the second paragraph of the opinion. Nothing more was asserted by the defendants as "cause" for their motion. Consequently, at the time of Judge Hartshorne's decision any need for the transcripts in pre-trial discovery was academic.

(4) Applying this standard to the circumstances of the present Big Case, we believe that defendants' motion for a copy of the transcript of the testimony of all witnesses should be granted. Our reasons are as follows:

(a) The testimony of all witnesses is presumably relevant. The Government has never otherwise contended. The Grand Jury was solely concerned with an investigation of the soap industry, all phases of which are directly involved in the comprehensive complaint herein (See Government's Press Release, December 11, 1952).

(b) Access to all of this testimony is necessary in fairness to the defendants, and in the efficient administration of this Big Case. As outlined above: (i) Defendants cannot otherwise be placed on a parity of information with the plaintiff. Depositions are inadequate. (ii) Unless defendants are fully informed, the date for trial will be delayed. Defendants will be required to resort to depositions, however unsatisfactory, which will require a great deal of time and be enormously expensive. (iii) The trial itself will be delayed, complicated and confused. As in the Grunstein case, adjournments will be required because of surprise. The Court will be confronted with requests to use, objections and demands for access to Grand Jury testimony. The possibility of stipulations will be decreased because defendants will not know the facts available to the plaintiff.

Necessity must, of course, be determined in light of the particular case in which the demand for access is made. "Necessity" includes the needs of the court to expedite and simplify the Big Case, as well as of the defendants. "Necessity" here, we submit, requires that the relevant evidence in the form of witnesses' testimony before the Grand Jury be furnished to defendants. There is no rule of law or reason against disclosure. It is to be granted or denied as "the ends of justice require". The Government cannot retain exclusive use of this material merely because it is physically in its possession or because of fanciful and remote fears. It was this same adamant refusal to recognize the dictates of reason and fair play that caused the Government to deny to a defendant access to his own testimony before the Grand Jury, even when he was charged with perjury in that very testimony. United States v. Remington, 191 F. 2d 246 (CA 2, 1951); United States v. Rose, 215 F. 2d 617 (CA 3, 1954).

We respectfully submit that no consideration of public policy, and certainly no principles of law, override in the [fol. 2194] present case the clear desirability of providing the defendants with access to the evidentiary material in the form of Grand Jury testimony to which the plaintiff in this action has and has had access.

REPLY MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF MOTION BY COLGATE-PALMOLIVE COMPANY FOR DISCLOSURE OF TESTIMONY
BEFORE THE GRAND JURY—January 4, 1956

Statement

This memorandum is submitted pursuant to permission given by the Court at the argument on December 12, 1955. It deals primarily with two topics: (1) an analysis of the position taken by counsel for the plaintiff at the argument and in a letter to the Court dated December 23, 1955, and (2) a discussion of the applicability to the present motions of the opinion filed December 19, 1955 in United States v. Ben Grunstein & Sons Co., Civil No. 888-51, by Judge Hartshorne of this Court.

Point I

The plaintiff's policy of using grand jury testimony in this civil action is inconsistent with its arguments for secrecy.

In a letter to the Court dated December 23, 1955, a copy of which we received December 27, 1955, Joseph E. Mc-[fol. 2197] Dowell, Esq., counsel for the plaintiff, stated:

"I am instructed respectfully to inform you that we do not wish to add to the statement which I made at the hearing."

This letter was in response to a question addressed by the Court to counsel for the plaintiff as to whether he objected to stating

"(a) what use, if any, plaintiff has made in the past of the grand jury transcripts while preparing for the trial of this case; (b) what use, if any, plaintiff intends to make of the transcripts during its future preparation for the trial; (c) what use, if any, plaintiff intends to make of the transcripts during the trial." (Tr. 6-7)

The Court suggested that counsel might wish to consult the higher echelons of the Department before answering (Tr. 104), and this suggestion was accepted (Tr. 108).

At the argument, however, counsel for the plaintiff did address himself to the question to some extent, albeit with obvious reluctance (Tr. 95, 104-8). As to parts (a) and (b) he professed a personal inability to answer because of the fact that he had had no connection with the case until last year (Tr. 105). As to part (b), this is unresponsive; and the plaintiff cannot disclaim knowledge of the use it has made of the transcripts.

His answer to part (c) was this:

"My own view—and I say this without prejudice, your Honor; I have given some consideration to it—my own view is that if the occasion should arise in the [fol. 2198] trial of this case where I would think that it might be appropriate or desirable to refer to a transcript of grand jury testimony, my view would be that question should be submitted to the Court for advice and ruling as to whether or not it would be appropriate." (Tr. 105)

At the conclusion of his statement, after saying that in some cases partial disclosure to the defendants resulted from references to the transcript made by the Government in argument, counsel for the plaintiff added:

"And I have tried to be very careful not to say anything. I, too, could speculate at great length, the way the defendants do, about the use made here, but I think it is sufficient to point out that it is all speculation and I don't propose to enter into it. And I think, for that reason, the furnishing of such a statement as your Honor has suggested might raise some serious question here. And I would prefer to discuss that with my superiors." (Tr. 107-8)

This is the nature of the statement on which the plaintiff apparently now proposes to rely in answer to the Court's question.

It seems fair, therefore, to say that the plaintiff has now refused to state the use which it has made of the grand jury testimony in this civil action or the use which it will make of that testimony in the future. Further, it has given no reason for that refusal other than to state that it does not propose to enter into "speculation" about its own policies and activities.

[fol. 2199] In the absence of enlightenment from the plaintiff, the only possible source of knowledge, we are entitled to assume what all the surrounding circumstances show: that the plaintiff began the grand jury investigation with at least the partial intention of using the grand jury to gather facts upon which to base a civil action; that all or most of the testimony before the grand jury was taken for the sole purpose of discovery for a civil action; that the present civil action was based upon that discovery; that the fullest use of the grand jury testimony has been and will be made by the plaintiff in preparation for trial of this action; and that the plaintiff proposes at the trial to make whatever use of the grand jury testimony it deems "appropriate or desirable", in the words of Mr. McDowell quoted above, subject to the "advice and ruling" of this Court. All these points were made in our briefs and oral argument, and the plaintiff does not deny any of them.

By adopting the position that it will make such use of the testimony at the trial as it deems "appropriate or desirable", the plaintiff has destroyed any argument that it has a claim of privilege or a position to speak in the public interest on the issue of grand jury secrecy.

At page 15 of its brief the plaintiff states that Rule 34 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure governs these motions. Under that rule, if the plaintiff has no claim of [fol. 2200] privilege, clearly it has no basis for opposing production of the grand jury testimony in its possession. The duty of the Court under or by analogy to Rule 6(e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure to balance the interest between grand jury secrecy when any of the reasons for it still remain and disclosure of testimony when the ends of justice require is a different matter, fully discussed in our main brief. But the plaintiff, as a party, has no basis other than privilege on which to oppose production. Good cause, burden, and the other usual Rule 34 problems have no relevance here, except as they relate to privilege. Nor can the plaintiff, as a party to a civil action, purport to act as an adviser to the Court on the public interest in the functioning of the grand jury system.

If the plaintiff were in a position to claim some sort of executive or governmental or public privilege or to advise the Court on the matter of grand jury secrecy in connection with such a privilege, its starting point would necessarily be the five reasons for grand jury secrecy enunciated in United States v. Rose, 215 F.2d 617, 628 (3d Cir. 1954):

There is only one of these reasons which counsel for the plaintiff mentioned during oral argument (Tr. 81-3) or which plaintiff's brief urges seriously (pp. 9-10) as a basis [fol. 2201] for withholding testimony. That is reason (4), which the Court in the Rose case stated as follows:

"(4) to encourage free and untrammelled disclosures by persons who have information with respect to the commission of crimes; . . ." (215 F.2d 628)

We have discussed in our main brief the considerations which make this reason inapplicable here. The plaintiff, however, has pressed it. Thus counsel for the plaintiff on the oral argument said of witnesses before the grand jury:

"If they are going to speak forthrightly at all, they will probably do so more easily if they feel that their testimony before the grand jury, as least, is secret.

"Now, it is true, they may consent at some future date to the disclosure of their testimony. However, if a precedent is created, that it becomes generally known throughout the land that testimony before a grand jury may become public knowledge, that they may be asked to give their consent, they may withhold a little more from the grand jury than they otherwise might.

"Now, this is a very real danger, disclosing transcript, even upon consent, when the consent could be obtained perhaps by pressures. This would make it virtually impossible for the Government to effectively discover anything about criminal conduct. And particularly this is true, we suggest, where the investigation is concerned with economic activity." (Tr. 82-3)

"With the statement that the plaintiff itself will seek to use the transcript if "appropriate or desirable", this argument disappears. The plaintiff will seek to use the [fol. 2202] transcript with or without consent of the witnesses. Thus all the dire consequences of possible disclosure painted by counsel for the plaintiff already exist to the fullest extent. Witnesses cannot assume that their testimony will be secret forever. The Government claims the right to seek permission for disclosure when it is "appropriate or desirable".

We do not quarrel with the plaintiff's right to seek disclosure. The plaintiff's statement of position is fully in accord with the law as set out in United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co., 310 U.S. 150, 233-4 (1940), citing 8 Wigmore, Evidence § 2362, and in United States v. Rose. As the Supreme Court stated "after the grand jury's functions are ended, disclosure is wholly proper where the ends of justice require it."

To picture, however, these dire consequences if witnesses know their testimony may be disclosed in a subsequent civil action on motion of the defendants, but none if on motion of the plaintiff, is fanciful. The fact is that when the grand jury has ceased to sit, no evil results will flow from disclosure of testimony, as Wigmore demonstrates in detail. The privilege of secrecy is temporary; and both the witness's privilege and the derivative privilege of the State in inducing testimony cease when the grand jury's function has ended.

[fol. 2203] The plaintiff's position shows that it has no real concern with grand jury secrecy as such, since it stands ready to end that secrecy when "appropriate or desirable". Its concern is to maintain its preferred position in civil cases in which it has used the grand jury to prepare by fostering an uncritical acceptance of the shibboleth of "secrecy". Unless the plaintiff will state that it has not used and will not under any circumstances use the grand jury testimony in the preparation or trial of the present civil action, it should be found to have waived any position it might otherwise have had to claim a privilege, whether in its own name or in that of the people.

An analogous situation arose in Fireman's Fund Indemnity Co. v. United States, 103 F.Supp. 915 (N.D. Fla., 1952). By motions under Admiralty Rule 32 libellant sought production of statements of all witnesses made to Naval investigators and testimony of all witnesses before a Navy Court of Inquiry convened to investigate the accident in question. The Secretary of the Navy filed in court a memorandum asserting privileged and confidential status of these records and declined to permit production, basing his claim on 5 U.S.C. § 22 and departmental regulations, just as the plaintiff does at pages 17-20 of its brief. The Court said:

[fol. 2204] "Where such action is justified, however, in cases in litigation, it is as applicable to the government counsel as to others. During the course of the argument in these cases the court gained the impression that the Navy had already furnished proctor for respondent with all the documents which proctor for libellant seeks authority to inspect and copy or photograph. If this is true, these documents have lost their privileged and confidential status. Pacific-Atlantic S. S. Co. v United States, 4 Cir., 175 F.2d 632..

"The motions filed in these cases make a showing of good cause for the inspection of the documents requested by proctor for libellant. The vessel on which this accident occurred was owned by the United States and completely in charge of Navy personnel. Practically all the evidence pertaining to the accident is contained in the records demanded by proctor for libellant and not otherwise available to him in his preparation of these cases for trial. To furnish these records to proctor for respondent for use by him in defending these cases and declining to make them available to proctor for libellant for use by him in his preparation of the cases for trial would be an act on the part of the Secretary of the Navy that would obstruct the administration of justice under law and should not be countenanced by any court." (103 F.Supp. 915-6)

Any records furnished to proctor for respondent were ordered produced. See also Bank Line, Ltd. v. United States, 76 F.Supp. 801 (S.D. N.Y. 1948), and Bowles v. Ackerman, 4 F.R.D. 260 (S.D. N.Y. 1945).

Apart from these considerations, it is plain that the plaintiff's attorneys have not pursued the procedure required for a claim of privilege by the Government. This procedure is laid down in United States v. Reynolds, 345 [fol. 2205] U.S. 1 (1953), a case under the Tort Claims Act upon which the plaintiff has placed major reliance, both in its brief (pp. 20, 24) and in oral argument (Tr. 92-3). If the plaintiff purports to claim a governmental privilege, or to advise this Court on how to preserve the function of the grand jury in future cases, it must do so on a basis no higher than that of preserving state secrets. We do not think an analogy to state secrets is appropriate, inasmuch as the Court rather than the plaintiff is under Rule 6(e) the designated protector of the grand jury. The plaintiff, however, can purport to claim a privilege (Tr. 88), or to ask for withholding in the public interest (Tr. 86), or to claim a privilege on behalf of the people (Tr. 89) only on the basis of some such analogy. The Supreme Court has made it plain, however, that such a claim of privilege, even when military or state secrets in the strict sense are involved, cannot be taken lightly:

“Judicial experience with the privilege, which protects military and state secrets has been limited in this country. English experience has been more extensive, but still relatively slight compared with other evidentiary privileges. Nevertheless, the principles which control the application of the privilege emerge quite clearly from the available precedents. The privilege belongs to the Government and must be asserted by it; it can neither be claimed nor waived by a private party. It is not to be lightly invoked. There must be a formal claim of privilege, lodged by the head of the department which has control over the matter, after actual personal consideration by that officer. The court itself must determine whether the circumstances are [fol. 2206] appropriate for the claim of privilege, and yet do so without forcing a disclosure of the very thing the privilege is designed to protect.” (345 U.S. 7-8; emphasis added)

In view of a formal claim of privilege by the Secretary of the Air Force and the fact that there was “nothing to suggest that the electronic equipment, in this case, had any causal connection with the accident” (345 U.S. 11), the Court sustained the privilege.

Here there has been nothing resembling a formal claim of privilege by the Attorney General. Indeed, it will be noted that the letter to the Court of December 23, 1955, unlike all prior letters in this action, was signed by the plaintiff's trial attorney rather than by the Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division. There is, therefore, no indication that this question has been considered either by the Attorney General or the Assistant Attorney General.

We do not say that a formal claim of privilege should have been made or would have been appropriate. The failure to make it, however, shows the plaintiff's own realization that no executive privilege is involved. The plaintiff is not and cannot be before this Court on this motion as one claiming an executive privilege or one purporting to speak for the general public interest in the preservation of the grand jury system.

[fol. 2207] Only the Court can speak as to what justice requires. Whether disclosure might in some way inhibit the function of the grand jury which has been discharged, or of future grand juries, is a matter for the Court's discretion. The views of counsel for the plaintiff as to what is good or bad for the public can be regarded as no more than lawyers' arguments. * They appear here only as attorneys for a civil litigant seeking in this civil action to retain a procedural advantage not contemplated by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

Wigmore, § 2362 says that the temporary secrecy of testimony "ceases when the grand jury has finished its duties . . .". The Supreme Court in the Socony-Vacuum case, citing Wigmore, said that "after the grand jury's functions are ended, disclosure is wholly proper where the ends of justice require it" (310 U.S. 233-4). In Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495, 507 (1947), the Supreme Court said that "deposition-discovery rules are to be accorded a broad and liberal treatment . . . Mutual knowledge of all the relevant facts gathered by both parties is essential to proper litigation." The inevitable conclusion would seem to be that the reasons for secrecy of testimony have ended and that disclosure in this civil action is required. Certainly the plaintiff's use of the grand jury testimony disarms it from arguing to the contrary.

Point II

The decision in United States v. Ben Grunstein & Sons Co. supports the granting of the present motions.

United States v. Ben Grunstein & Sons Co., in which an opinion was filed December 19, 1955 by Judge Harfshorne, is an action for damages brought by the United States under the False Claims Act, 31 U.S.C. §§ 231 et seq. The subject matter is alleged fraudulent sales of meat by a packing company and eight other defendants to the armed forces. A previous grand jury investigation resulted in an indictment filed in 1951 against the packing company and one of the individual defendants and several other persons, which also referred to all of the current civil defendants as parties to the conspiracy which was both the subject of the indictment and a part of the current civil action. The two current defendants indicted pleaded guilty on one count and were sentenced; and the balance of the proceedings under the indictment have long since been terminated.

The defendants in the civil action sought disclosure of the grand jury testimony of each of the nine defendants and of any other witnesses who are to testify in the proceedings on the part of either the plaintiff or the defendants.

The Court pointed out the broad discovery policy of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure "consistent with [fol. 2209] recognized privileges", as expressed in Hickman v. Taylor. One of these privileges was found to be "that of the grand jury as a public institution, as well as of the witnesses that appear before it" (p. 3). The grand jury's function having ended, the question thus was found to be whether "the ends of justice require" disclosure, in the language of United States v. Socony-Vacuum Oil Co. The Court said:

"Looking at the parties themselves, the ends of justice would clearly call for a discovery of what plaintiff knows of this relevant testimony, to defendant, in order that the parties may be placed on a parity. So we turn to the question as to how far the above policy of secrecy, for the protection of both the public and the witnesses, countervails this unbalanced situation between the parties themselves." (p. 4)

The Court then quoted the five traditional reasons for secrecy from United States v. Rose. Only reasons (3) and (4) were deemed applicable, the grand jury's functions having terminated. Reason (3), relating to subornation of perjury, was held inconsistent with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. There remained reason (4), relating to encouraging free disclosure of witnesses. The Court said:

"On the other hand, the privilege attending such witnesses, both for their own benefit and that of the body politic, should not go so far as to invite possible perjury. This would be the case, were any such witness, from that very fact, to be free from any possible later inquiry as to his testimony before the Grand Jury in that regard." (pp. 6-7)

[fol. 2210] The defendants had all stated that they would take the stand. This fact the Court held to waive any possible claim of privilege on their behalf:

"For no witness before a Grand Jury can possibly expect, for similar reasons, that if he is later a witness in either a criminal or civil proceeding, based on the very transaction to which he has testified before the Grand Jury, that he will not be asked what he has previously admitted to be the fact concerning that transaction, whether on the street, in court, or before the Grand Jury. Thus such discovery will not unduly discourage free and untrammelled disclosures by witnesses to Grand Juries. Thus there is no sound objection to such discovery, necessary as between the civil parties, on the ground of protection of the individual witness or of the public." (pp. 7-8)

To the extent that the defendants desired their own testimony the Court held the sanctity of the grand jury was hardly in question, citing United States v. Rose.

"In short, any defendant in these civil proceedings, or any other witness before the Grand Jury in this regard, who will definitely take the stand as a witness in the case at bar, should have disclosed to the defense his testimony before the Grand Jury in that regard." (p. 8)

Thus the defendants were granted what they sought, as the Court again stated in its conclusion (p. 12).

The following statement is of particular interest with regard to the plaintiff's claim of privilege, discussed in Point I:

[fol. 2211] "Here it should be noted that the Grand Jury is an arm of the Court, not an arm of the plaintiff, the United States Government, which in the present civil case is acting through, not the Court, but its execufive arm, the Department of Justice. "The Constitution itself makes the Grand Jury a part of the judicial process * * *. The proceedings before a Grand Jury constitute "a judicial inquiry" * * * (Cobbledick v. U. S., 309 U.S. 323, 327 (1940)). It therefore follows that, strictly speaking, defense is here seeking disclosure, not from plaintiff, but from the Court itself, which obviously should treat the parties alike in their rights to relevant testimony. It further follows that such testimony is not the 'work product' of the plaintiff, protected from disclosure, as a limited privilege, by Hickman; supra." (p. 8)

The Court then discussed the question of witnesses before the grand jury whom it was not known would be called in the civil proceeding. The names of these witnesses could have been discovered by demanding a list of witnesses known to the plaintiff who know the facts relevant to the case at bar.

"This list would of course include the names of all the witnesses in that regard before the Grand Jury. Then defendants, by examining these witnesses personally, or on deposition, can ascertain from them the very evidence they gave the Grand Jury. Indeed, after taking such discovery, if there is any real question still, for any unusual reason, as to what such witness may have told the Grand Jury, defendants can then apply to the Court, either to obtain a copy of such testimony for themselves, or perhaps better still, to have the Court itself inspect same, to see if same should, in fairness, be revealed to them." (p. 9) [fol. 2212]. In view of this ready remedy the limited privilege should be preserved and no "good cause" for the additional remedy of disclosure is shown. If, however, these witnesses are ultimately called, their grand jury testimony should be given to the defendants, and if surprise is involved, further examination of these witnesses by the defendants should be deferred to permit proper use of the minutes for impeachment or rehabilitation (pp. 10-11).

It is only at this last point that the Grunstein opinion might be argued to run counter to the granting of the present motions. However, the differences between that case and the present one make the formula there prescribed for witnesses before the grand jury not known to be slated to testify at the trial inadequate here.

(1) The question before the Court did not really involve such witnesses. Only those who were to testify were covered by the defendant's requested relief, and the Court granted full relief as to them. In the present case, general discovery is sought, not merely testimony of witnesses at the trial for purposes of examination.

(2) The grand jury had ~~not~~ been used there, as here, for the very purpose of civil discovery. Thus the deliberate use of the grand jury as a private fact-gathering body in contravention of the aims of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure was not present.

[fol. 2213] (3) The Grunstein case presumably involved a fairly specific set of transactions. The present case, on the other hand, is a sprawling affair taking in all aspects of the history of a major industry for 25 years. There it might well have been practicable by deposition to reproduce grand jury testimony, although the question arises as to why that effort should be made when the possibility of secrecy of grand jury testimony is eliminated thereby. Here a reproduction of the grand jury testimony is impossible, the scope of examination being so great. The burden is tremendously enhanced. The confusion produced by multiple transcripts is greater, and the possibility of delay through surprise at the trial is greater. The present case is a "big case" in the true sense of the term. Simplification of pretrial procedures and avoidance of adjournments at the trial such as the Grunstein opinion appears to contemplate are important here far beyond the ordinary case.

Under the reasoning of the Grunstein opinion the defendants here could obtain from the plaintiff a list of all witnesses with knowledge, which would include all grand jury witnesses. They could then take the depositions of all these witnesses and as to such as appeared before the grand jury secure their best recollection of their grand jury testimony. [fol. 2214] This would clearly destroy any secrecy of the grand jury proceeding. Then, if the testimony appeared to be favorable, the defendants could call any of these witnesses they chose at the trial, and upon announcing their intention to do so could then secure the grand jury testimony. Equally, at such time as the plaintiff indicated any of these witnesses would be called, the defendants could secure their grand jury testimony. In a case already as vast and formless as the present one, no good and much harm would seem to flow from such a roundabout procedure.

(4) In the Grunstein case the question of consenting witnesses other than the defendants was not raised. However, the discussion appears to support the thesis that the privilege, such as it is, is that of the witness. Thus the Court said:

"Considering the defendants themselves, their counsel have expressly represented to the Court that they will each and all take the witness stand on their own behalf in the present trial. Such being the case, that very action waives any possible claim of privilege on their own behalf, as to what they may have testified to in that regard before the Grand Jury. For no one can be permitted to testify only in part, as to what he has said or done, in regard to a particular transaction." (p. 7)

Equally it would appear competent for a witness to waive whatever privilege he might have by some other voluntary act and thus make his testimony available.

[fol. 2215] The Court has asked counsel the present status of Herzog v. United States, 75 Sup. Ct. 349 (1955). The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals has confirmed the conviction for attempted income tax evasion, 226 F. 2d 561 (9th Cir. 1955) in an opinion reported in the December, 12, 1955 advance sheets. The question of inspecting grand jury testimony of hostile witnesses was discussed without allusion to Mr. Justice Douglas's opinion in connection with granting bail. While recognizing the power of a court under Rule 6(c) to order grand jury minutes produced for inspection where there is a clear showing that the ends of justice require, the Court found that no foundation for inspection had been laid and that accordingly such inspection would have constituted a "fishing expedition". It would appear that the question could come before the Supreme Court only if a petition for certiorari on this point were now filed and granted.

The Herzog and Grunstein cases afford a useful distinction between criminal and civil cases. In civil cases, as the Supreme Court stated in Hickman v. Taylor, a "fishing expedition" is the proper procedure. In criminal cases it is not, as the Court held in Bowman Dairy Co. v. United States, 341 U.S. 214 (1951). Whether Mr. Justice Douglas or the Supreme Court would agree with the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals as to what constitutes a fishing expedition [fol. 2216-2217] might have no application in a civil action. As the Bowman Dairy case shows, grand jury secrecy will not forestall applicability of the appropriate discovery rules to criminal cases. The Grunstein opinion applies the appropriate discovery rule in a civil case by allowing disclosure as to witnesses who will testify at the trial, the only question before the Court.

This is not the limit of civil discovery, however, under the express language of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Rule 26(b), whose scope governs Rule 34, provides:

"It is not ground for objection that the testimony will be inadmissible at the trial if the testimony sought appears reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence."

Where the question of general discovery of all the grand jury testimony is presented in the circumstances of the present case, the reasoning of the Grunstein case and the authorities discussed there lead to the conclusion that such discovery should be granted.

DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY

[Title omitted]

BRIEF OF THE PROCTER & GAMBLE COMPANY IN OPPOSITION TO PLAINTIFF'S MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION AND FOR RULING
ON CLAIM OF PRIVILEGE—May 14, 1956

In answer to the plaintiff's motion for reconsideration and claim of privilege, filed on May 3, 1956, it seems sufficient to say that:

All the contentions now made by plaintiff have heretofore been fully presented to and considered by the Court. The Court has been exceedingly liberal in permitting views to be presented by all parties—at some length—and has given these contentions full consideration and rendered a comprehensive opinion with respect to them.

[fol. 2219] The so-called "Claim of Privilege" was fully covered by the plaintiff in its previous written and oral presentation to Your Honor. In addition, the claim was again specifically called to Your Honor's attention by plaintiff in sending you on April 5th a copy of an almost identical claim of privilege by the Attorney General filed in Civil No. 11584-C in the District Court for the Southern District of California. The plaintiff in its letter of April 5th specifically described this California claim as being "based on the same grounds urged by counsel for the Government in the motions now pending" before this Court. Both of these privilege claims were presented to and given full consideration by Your Honor prior to your decision and opinion, and now plaintiff is seeking to present the same argument a third time.

Likewise, none of the citations in plaintiff's motion adds anything to the authorities fully presented to the Court prior to the delivery of its opinion. All but three of them were previously cited in the original briefs, supplemental papers or argument.

One of these three, Schmidt v. United States, 6 Cir., 115 F. 2d 394, merely involved an unauthorized interrogation of grand jurors. Furthermore, the Court in that case in [fol. 2220] effect supported Your Honor's opinion by saying (p. 397):

"Logically, the responsibility for relaxing the rule of secrecy and of supervising any subsequent inquiry should reside in the court, of which the grand jury is a part and under the general instructions of which it conducted its 'judicial inquiry'."

Another of the cases, United States v. Schneiderman, S.D. Cal., 104 F. Supp. 405, related largely to disclosure of identity of informants under the limited discovery provisions of the criminal rules and referred briefly to the general policy of secrecy of Grand Jury proceedings. In that case there was no issue as to, nor any discussion of, disclosure of Grand Jury transcripts where, as in this case, the interest of justice required it.

The third citation, 4 Moore's Federal Practice (2d ed.), pp. 1175-6, does not relate to Grand Jury transcripts but merely to governmental privileges not asserted here. On the general question of "privilege", Moore specifically states that the Courts, after giving consideration to the Government's views (as was certainly done in this case) should determine the question of disclosure. Illuminatingly, Professor Moore adds that the Government, when a party, "cannot assert any absolute privilege against discovery * * *; it cannot make charges against a party and then [fol. 2221-2224] refuse to let him know the basis of the charges". This is substantially the effect of Your Honor's opinion.

It is submitted that this Court should deny plaintiff's motion for reconsideration and, in accordance with its opinion, sign the order tendered by Procter on May 2, 1956.

[Title omitted]

BRIEF OF THE DEFENDANT, ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN SOAP & GLYCERINE PRODUCERS, INC., IN OPPOSITION TO PLAINTIFF'S MOTION FOR REHEARING AND CLAIM OF PRIVILEGE

Motion for Rehearing

Plaintiff does not state any ground for rehearing in this case. Every point made in its motion was raised in its previous brief and fully argued before the Court. The briefs of Defendants were extensive and practically an entire day was spent in argument before this Court.

The Claim of Privilege

Plaintiff's claim of privilege is the same as heretofore made. Therefore, we will advert to it only briefly.

The claim states (1) that the Attorney General has a joint responsibility with the Courts to protect the integrity of the Grand Jury processes, and (2) that the Department of Justice holds the transcripts of Grand Jury testimony as a trustee for the benefit of the public. We submit that neither point is well taken.

1. The Grand Jury has for centuries been a part of the judiciary (28 C.J. 763). The Constitution recognizes it as a part of the judiciary—one of the three coordinate branches of Government provided by that document (Constitution Amendment V). The Supreme Court in Cobbledick v. United States, 309 U.S. 323, 327, says:

"The Constitution itself makes the Grand Jury a part of the judicial process. It must initiate prosecution for the most important federal crimes. It does so under general instructions from the Court to which it is attached and to which, from time to time, it reports its findings. The proceeding before a Grand Jury constitutes 'a judicial inquiry' (Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 66) of the most ancient lineage."

The Court in United States v. Smyth, 104 Fed. Supp. 283, 291, states:

"The Grand Jury is an arm or agency of the Court by which it is appointed."

On December 19, 1955, the District Court for the District of New Jersey filed its opinion after a hearing on an application for discovery of Grand Jury minutes (United States of America v. Ben Graunstein and Sons Company, et al., 137 Fed. Supp. 197). There the Court said:

"Here it should be noted that the Grand Jury is an arm of the Court, and not an arm of the plaintiff, the United States Government, which in the present civil case is acting through, not the Court, but its executive arm, the Department of Justice. The Constitution itself makes the Grand Juries a part of judicial processes. * * * The proceedings before a Grand Jury constitute 'a judicial inquiry.' * * * (Cobbledick v. United States, 309 U.S. 323, 327 (1940)). It therefore follows that, strictly speaking, defense is here seeking disclosure, not from plaintiff but from the Court itself, which obviously should treat the public alike in their rights to relevant testimony."

[fol. 2227] In United States v. Wells (D: Idaho 1908) 163 Fed. 313, 325, the Court said in part:

"It is proper in this connection to keep in mind the fact, already noticed, that the only valid basis on which the institution of Grand Juries rests is that they are an independent and impartial tribunal between the prosecution and the accused; and it is the duty of the Courts to refuse to tolerate any practice which conflicts with this independence and impartiality. * * * The purpose of the institution of Grand Juries was, as we have seen, to interpose a check upon the sovereign; and they would cease to answer this purpose, and would increase the danger they were intended to avert, if they should be put under the official direction of the prosecuting authorities of the state."

In In Re National Windowglass Workers (Northern District Ohio 1922) 287 Fed. 219, 225, the Court says:

“A Grand Jury has no existence aside from the Court which calls it into existence, and upon which it is attending. A Grand Jury does not become, after it is summoned, impaneled and sworn, an independent planet, as it were, in the judicial system, but still remains an appendage of the Court on which it is attending. * * * It is and remains a Grand Jury attending on the Court, and does not, after it is organized, become an independent body, functioning at its uncontrolled will, or the will of the district attorney or special assistant.”

In Schmidt v. United States, 115 Fed. 2nd 394, 397, the Court says:

“Logically, the responsibility for relaxing the rule of secrecy and of supervising any subsequent inquiry should reside in the Court, of which the Grand Jury is a part, and under the general instructions of which it conducted its judicial inquiry.” (Emphasis supplied.)

Hoffman v. United States, 341 U.S. 479, 485;

Hale v. Henkel, 201 U.S. 43, 59.

[fol. 2228] Some decisions state expressly that the Court alone has the jurisdiction or power to remove the veil of secrecy of Grand Jury proceedings. In United States v. Byoir, 58 Fed. Supp. 273, the Court said:

“What was done here is evidence and may be advantaged by either party, having in mind, of course, the question of the secrecy of the Grand Jury proceedings. And the only jurisdiction over such matters is in this Court * * *. The veil of secrecy may be torn asunder in the interest of justice, and such lifting is within the jurisdiction of the Court empanelling the Grand Jury, and also within its sound discretion.”

See also:

United States v. Alper, 156 Fed. 2d 222.

United States v. National Wholesale Druggists Association, 61 Fed. Supp. 590.

The Rules of Criminal Procedure provide that the Court shall order one or more Grand Juries to be summoned at such time as the public interest requires. The Court in United States v. Smith, supra, states:

"There are various methods by which the Court may exercise control. * * * The Judge may discharge a Grand Jury at any time for any reason or for no reason, and whether they have finished the matter in hand or not."

The Rules of Criminal Procedure seem clearly to recognize that control of Grand Jury records rests with the Courts. These rules provide:

"Disclosure of matters occurring before the Grand Jury other than its deliberations and the vote of any juror may be made to the attorneys for the Government for use in the performance of their duties. Otherwise a juror, attorney, interpreter or stenographer may disclose matters occurring before the grand jury only when so directed by the court preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding or when permitted by the court at the request of the defendant upon a showing that grounds may exist for a motion to dismiss the indictment because of matters occurring before the grand jury. No obligation of secrecy may be imposed upon any person except in accordance with this rule. The court may direct that an indictment shall be kept secret until the defendant is in custody or has given bail, and in that event the clerk shall seal the indictment and no person shall disclose the finding of the indictment except when necessary for the issuance and execution of a warrant or summons."

[fol 2229] If the Supreme Court in approving the Rules of Criminal Procedure had not been of the opinion that the transcript of testimony before a Grand Jury was within the control of the Court, it most certainly would not have adopted or approved this rule.

Control of the Grand Juries Could not Constitutionally be Conferred on the Attorney General.

The above and many other decisions establish beyond question that the Grand Jury is a part of the judicial branch of the Government, that the Courts alone have constitutional power to protect the integrity of Grand Jury processes, and that the Attorney General is not invested with any power in that regard. We have not found any decision of the Federal Courts holding that the Court to which a Grand Jury is attached is without power to give a party to litigation in that Court access to the transcript of testimony before a Grand Jury of that Court when the Judge is of opinion that such access would be in the interest of justice. The decisions are all to the effect that such access is discretionary with the Court.

To hold that the responsibility for access to Grand Jury records is a joint responsibility of the Court and the Attorney General would be to transfer in part to the executive branch of the Government that responsibility which the Constitution lodges solely with the Courts. The Attorney General, his assistants, and the district attorney may come into Court in a case to which the United States is a party and advance arguments with respect to the adverse effect on the public interest of permitting access to such transcripts. When any of those persons do come into Court representing the Government, they are, for the time being, officers of the Court.

In United States v. Smyth 104 Fed. Supp. 283, 291, the Court says:

[fols. 2230-2231] "The United States Attorney, his assistants, the United States Marshal and his deputies and bailiffs, appointed by him to guard their deliberations, and, modernly, the reporters who record the proceedings, are likewise officers of the Courts."

The power to control the transcript of testimony and other records of Grand Jury proceedings is clearly in the Court to which the Grand Jury is attached, since the Constitution manifestly places the Grand Jury as a part of the judiciary.

Since when, we might ask, has the executive branch of the Government become a better judge of public policy or public interest than the Courts? The books contain hundreds of decisions of the Courts based on public policy. For years the Courts have determined whether public policy requires that access to Grand Jury records be given or withheld and, we submit, that they are still competent to do so.

It is questionable whether Congress itself could enact a valid law transferring control of transcripts of testimony before Grand Juries, or any part of such control, to the Attorney General. Such transfer would, we believe, violate the Constitution.

[Title omitted]

MEMORANDUM OF LEVER BROTHERS COMPANY IN OPPOSITION TO PLAINTIFF'S MOTION FOR RECONSIDERATION AND FOR RULING ON CLAIM OF PRIVILEGE

Plaintiff's Motion For Reconsideration and For Ruling on Claim of Privilege is predicated on the fact that "the Attorney General * * * has filed with this Court a formal Claim of Privilege asserting the privileged status of said transcripts of Grand Jury testimony".

This claim of alleged privilege, however, has already been before this Court and received its thorough consideration. In its brief, filed with the Court on December 7, 1955, Plaintiffs set forth as Point III the proposition "Transcripts of Grand Jury testimony are protected against production by the exception accorded privileged documents under Rule 34." Under this proposition, the Department's brief argued at length that the Grand Jury transcripts were [fol. 2234] subject to a claim of privilege by the Attorney General. There would appear to be no difference between the contention advanced in that brief and those brought forward by the present motion for reconsideration except that the present claim is now characterized as "formal". But nothing of substance is added by styling as "formal" a claim previously made informally. The present motion, therefore, brings forward no genuinely new matter for the Court's consideration.

The truth is that the Attorney General has no privilege touching Grand Jury transcripts. The Grand Jury historically developed as an arm of the Court, and its proceedings and the conduct of parties before it have traditionally been subject exclusively to judicial control. This control has now been codified in Rule 6(e), F.R.C.P., which provides that "Otherwise a juror, attorney, interpreter, or stenographer may disclose matters occurring before the Grand Jury only when so directed by the Court preliminarily to or in connection with a judicial proceeding * * *".

Indeed, In Re Bullock, 103 F. Supp. 639, (D.C. 1952), on which the Department purports to rely, completely refutes the notion that the Attorney General has any privilege respecting Grand Jury minutes. There the District Attorney was required to obtain the permission of the Court before disclosing the transcripts because, as the Court observed (p. 641), the Federal Courts "may remove the seal of privacy from Grand Jury proceedings when in the Court's discretion the furtherance of justice requires [fol. 2235] it." (Emphasis in original).

Motions for reconsideration have never been favored. As Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking from the bench of the Supreme Court, once observed

“This custom of making motions for a rehearing is not a custom to be encouraged. It prevails in some States as a matter of ordinary practice to grant a rehearing on a mere application for it, but that practice we do not consider a legitimate one in this Court. It is possible that in the haste of examining cases before us, we sometimes overlook something, and then we are willing to have that pointed out, but to consider that this Court will reexamine the matter and change its judgment on a case, it seems to me, is not taking a proper view of the functions of this court”

(Charles Evans Hughes, The Supreme Court of the United States (1928), 71-72.)

Because of the lack of any genuinely new matter to support the Government's Motion and because of the well-established judicial policy against granting reconsideration in the absence of such new matter, we respectfully submit that the Plaintiff's Motion for Reconsideration should be, in all respects, denied.
